

THE UNIVERSITY LIBRARY RECEIVED ON THE SPECTATOR

VOLUME the THIRD.

N. 215

R. Hayman inv. & delin.

J. P. Ravenel Sculp.

L O N D O N :

Printed for JACOB and RICHARD TONSON in the Strand.

MDCCLVII.

To the Right Honourable

HENRY BOYLE, Esq;

S I R,

AS the profest design of this Work is to entertain its readers in general with-

DEDICATION.

out giving offence to any particular person, it would be difficult to find out so proper a Patron for it as yourself, there being none whose merit is more universally acknowledged by all Parties, and who has made himself more friends and fewer enemies. Your great abilities, and unquestioned integrity, in those high Employments which you have passed through, would not have been able to have raised you this general

DEDICATION.

neral approbation, had they not been accompanied with that moderation in an high fortune, and that affability of manners, which are so conspicuous through all parts of your life. Your averſion to any oſtentatious arts of ſetting to ſhow thoſe great Services which you have done the Public, has not likewise a little contributed to that univerſal acknowledgment which is paid you by your country.

The

DEDICATION.

The consideration of this part of your character, is that which hinders me from enlarging on those extraordinary Talents, which have given you so great a figure in the British Senate, as well as on that elegance and politeness which appear in your more retired conversation. I should be unpardonable, if, after what I have said, I should longer detain you with an Address of this nature : I cannot, however, conclude it without owning

DEDICATION.

owning those great obligations which you have laid upon,

SIR,

Your most obedient,

humble servant,

The SPECTATOR.

THE SPECTATOR.

V O L. III.

N^o 170 Friday, September 14, 1711.

In amore hæc omnia insunt vitia: injuriæ, Suspiciones, inimicitia, induciæ, Bellum, pax rursum——— Ter. Eun. Act 1. Sc. 1.

All these inconveniences are incident to love:
reproaches, jealousies, quarrels, reconcilements, war, and then peace.

UPON looking over the letters of my female correspondents, I find several from women complaining of jealous husbands, and at the same time protesting their own innocence; and desiring my advice on this occasion. I shall therefore take this subject into my consideration; and the more willingly, because I find that the Marquis of Hallifax, who, in his Advice to a Daughter, has instructed a wife how to behave herself towards a false, an intemperate, a choleric, a sullen, a covetous or a silly husband, has not spoken one word of a jealous husband.

‘ Jealousy is that pain which a man feels ‘ from the apprehension that he is not equally ‘ beloved by the person whom he intirely loves.’
 Now because our inward passions and inclinations can never make themselves visible, it is impossible for a jealous man to be thoroughly cured of his suspicions. His thoughts hang at best in a state of doubtfulness and uncertainty; and are never capable of receiving any satisfaction on the advantageous side; so that his inquiries are most successful when they discover nothing: His pleasure arises from his disappointments, and his life is spent in pursuit of a secret that destroys his happiness if he chance to find it.

An ardent love is always a strong ingredient in this passion; for the same affection which stirs up the jealous man’s desires, and gives the party beloved so beautiful a figure in his imagination, makes him believe she kindles the same passion in others, and appears as amiable to all beholders. And as Jealousy thus arises from an extraordinary Love, it is of so delicate a nature, that it scorns to take up with any thing less than an equal return of Love. Not the warmest expressions of affection, the softest and most tender hypocrisy, are able to give any satisfaction, where we are not persuaded that the affection is real and the satisfaction mutual. For the jealous man wishes himself a kind of Deity

Deity to the person he loves: He would be the only pleasure of her senses, the employment of her thoughts; and is angry at every thing she admires, or takes delight in, besides himself.

Phædria's request to his mistress, upon his leaving her for three days, is inimitably beautiful and natural.

Cum milite isto præsens, absens ut sis :

Dies noctesque me ames me desideres :

Me somnias : me expectes : de me cogites :

Me speres : me te oblectes : mecum tota sis :

Meus fac sis postremò animus, quando ego sum tuus.

Ter. Eun. Act 1. Sc. 2.

‘ When you are in company with that Soldier, ‘ behave as if you were absent: but continue to ‘ love me by day and by night: want me; dream ‘ of me; expect me; think of me; wish for me; ‘ delight in me: be wholly with me: in short, be ‘ my very Soul, as I am yours.’

The jealous man's disease is of so malignant a nature, that it converts all it takes into its own nourishment. A cool behaviour sets him on the rack, and is interpreted as an instance of aversion or indifference; a fond one raises his suspicions, and looks too much like dissimulation and artifice. If the person he loves be chearful, her thoughts must be employed on another; and if sad, she is certainly thinking on himself. In short, there is no word or gesture so insignificant, but it gives him new hints, feeds his suspicions, and furnishes him with fresh matters of discovery: So that if we consider the effects of this passion, one would rather think it proceeded from an inveterate hatred, than an excessive love; for certainly none can meet with more disquietude and uneasiness than a suspected wife, if we except the jealous husband.

But the great unhappiness of this passion is, that it naturally tends to alienate the affection which it is so solicitous to engross; and that for these two reasons, because it lays too great a constraint on the words and actions of the suspected person, and at the same time shews you have no honourable opinion of her; both of which are strong motives to aversion.

Nor is this the worst effect of Jealousy; for it often draws after it a more fatal train of consequences, and makes the person you suspect, guilty of the very crimes you are so much afraid of. It is very natural for such who are treated ill and upbraided falsely, to find out an intimate friend that will hear their complaints, condole their sufferings, and endeavour to sooth and assuage their secret resentments. Besides, Jealousy puts a woman often in mind of an ill thing that she would not otherwise perhaps have thought of, and fills her imagination with such an unlucky idea, as in time grows familiar, excites desire, and loses all the shame and horror which might at first attend it. Nor is it a wonder if she who suffers wrongfully in a man's opinion of her, and has therefore nothing to forfeit in his esteem, resolves to give him reason for his suspicions, and to enjoy the pleasure of the crime, since she must undergo the ignominy. Such probably were the considerations that directed the wise man in his advice to husbands; 'Be not jealous over the wife of thy bosom, and teach her not an evil lesson against thyself.' Ecclus.

And here, among the other torments which this passion produces, we may usually observe that none are greater mourners than jealous men, when the person who provoked their Jealousy is taken from them. Then it is that their love breaks out furiously, and throws off all the mixtures of suspicion which choked and smothered it before. The beautiful parts of the character rise uppermost in the jealous husband's memory, and upbraid him with the ill usage of so divine a creature as was once in his possession; whilst all the little imperfections, that were before so uneasy to him, wear off from his remembrance, and shew themselves no more.

We may see by what has been said, that Jealousy takes the deepest root in men of amorous dispositions; and of these we may find three kinds who are most over-run with it.

The first are those who are conscious to themselves of an infirmity, whether it be weakness, old age, deformity, ignorance, or the like. These men are so well acquainted with the unamiable part of themselves, that they have not the confidence to think they are really beloved; and are so distrustful of their own merits, that all fondness towards them puts them out of countenance, and looks like a jest upon their persons. They grow suspicious on their first looking in a glass, and are stung with Jealousy at the sight of a wrinkle. A handsome fellow immediately alarms them, and every thing that looks young or gay turns their thoughts upon their wives.

A second sort of men, who are most liable to this passion, are those of cunning, wary, and distrustful tempers. It is a fault very justly found in histories composed by politicians, that they leave nothing to chance or humour, but are still for deriving every action from some plot and contrivance, for drawing up a perpetual scheme of causes and events, and preserving a constant correspondence between the camp and the council-table. And thus it happens in the affairs of Love with men of too refined a thought. They put a construction on a look, and find out a design in a smile; they give new senses and significations to words and actions; and are ever tormenting themselves with fancies of their own raising. They generally act in a disguise themselves, and therefore mistake all outward shows and appearances for hypocrisy in others; so that I believe no men see less of the truth and reality of things, than these great refiners upon incidents, who are so wonderfully subtle and over-wise in their conceptions.

Now what these men fancy they know of women by reflexion, your lewd and vicious men believe they have learned by experience. They have seen the poor husband so misled by tricks and artifices, and in the midst of his inquiries inquiries so lost and bewildered in a crooked intrigue, that they still suspect an under-plot in every female action; and especially where they see any resemblance in the behaviour of two persons, are apt to fancy it proceeds from the same design in both. These men therefore bear hard upon the suspected party, pursue her close through all her turnings and windings, and are too well acquainted with the chace, to be flung off by any false steps or doubles: Besides, their acquaintance and conversation has lain wholly among the vicious part of womankind, and therefore it is no wonder they censure all alike, and look upon the whole Sex as a species of impostors. But if, notwithstanding their private experience, they can get over these prejudices, and entertain a favourable opinion of some women; yet their own loose desires will stir up new suspicions from another side, and make them believe all men subject to the same inclinations with themselves.

Whether these or other motives are most predominant, we learn from the modern histories of America, as well as from our own experience in this part of the world, that Jealousy is no northern passion, but rages most in those nations that lie nearest the influence of the sun. It is a misfortune for a woman to be born between the Tropics; for there lie the hottest regions of Jealousy, which as you come northward cools all along with the climate, until you scarce meet with any thing like it in the Polar circle. Our own nation is very temperately situated in this respect; and if we meet with some few disordered with the violence of this passion, they are not the proper growth of our country, but are many degrees nearer the sun in their constitutions than in their climate.

After this frightful account of Jealousy, and the persons who are most subject to it, it will be but fair to shew by what means the passion may be best allayed, and those who are possessed with it set at ease. Other faults indeed are not under the wife's jurisdiction, and should, if possible, escape her observation; but Jealousy calls upon her particularly for its cure, and deserves all her art and application in the attempt: Besides, she has this for her encouragement, that her endeavours will be always pleasing, and that she will still find the affection of her husband rising towards her in proportion as his doubts and suspicions vanish; for, as we have seen all along, there is so great a mixture of Love in Jealousy as is well worth the separating. But this shall be the subject of another Paper. L

N^o 171 Saturday, September 15.

Credula res amor est——— Ovid. Met. l. 7. v. 826.

The man, who loves, is easy of belief.

HAVING in my yesterday's Paper discovered the nature of Jealousy, and pointed out the persons who are most subject to it, I must here apply myself to my fair correspondents, who desire to live well with a jealous husband, and to ease his mind of its unjust suspicions.

The first rule I shall propose to be observed is, that you never seem to dislike in another what the jealous man is himself guilty of, or to admire any thing in which he himself does not excel. A jealous man is very quick in his applications, he knows how to find a double edge in an invective, and to draw a satire on himself out of a panegyric on another. He does not trouble himself to consider the person, but to direct the character; and is secretly pleased or confounded as he finds more or less of himself in it. The commendation of any thing in another stirs up his Jealousy, as it shews you have a value for others besides himself; but the commendation of that, which he himself wants, inflames him more, as it shews that in some respects you prefer others before him. Jealousy is admirably described in this view by Horace in his Ode to Lydia.

Quum

Quum tu, lydia, Telephi

Cervicem roseam, & cerea Telephi

Laudas brachia, vae meum

Fervens difficili bile tumet jecur :

Tunc nec mens mihi, nec color

Certâ sede manet; humor & in genas

Furtim labitur, arguens

Quàm lentis penitus macerer ignibus. Od. 13. l. 1.

When Telephus his youthful charms,
His rosy neck and winding arms,
With endless rapture you recite,
And in the pleasing name delight;
My heart, inflam'd by jealous heats,
With numberless resentments beats;
From my pale cheek the colour flies,
And all the man within me dies:
By turns my hidden grief appears
In rising sighs and falling tears,
That shew too well the warm desires,
The silent, slow, consuming fires,
Which on my inmost vitals prey,
And melt my very soul away.

The jealous man is not indeed angry if you dislike another: but if you find those faults which are to be found in his own character, you discover not only your dislike of another, but of himself. In short, he is so desirous of engrossing all your love, that he is grieved at the want of any charm, which he believes has power to raise it; and if he finds by your censures on others, that he is not so agreeable in your opinion as he might be, he naturally concludes you could love him better if he had other qualifications, and that by consequence your affection tion does not rise so high as he thinks it ought. If therefore his temper be grave or sullen, you must not be too much pleased with a jest, or transported with any thing that is gay and diverting. If his beauty be none of the best, you must be a professed admirer of prudence, or any other quality he is master of, or at least vain enough to think he is.

In the next place, you must be sure to be free and open in your conversation with him, and to let in light upon your actions, to unravel all your designs, and discover every secret however trifling or indifferent. A jealous husband has a particular aversion to winks and whispers, and if he does not see to the bottom of every thing, will be sure to go beyond it in his fears and suspicions. He will always expect to be your chief confidant, and where he finds himself kept out of a secret, will believe there is more in it than there should be. And here it is of great concern, that you preserve the character of your sincerity uniform and of a piece: for if he once finds a false gloss put upon any single action, he quickly suspects all the rest; his working imagination immediately takes a false hint, and runs off with it into several remote consequences, until he has proved very ingenious in working out his own misery.

If both these methods fail, the best way will be to let him see you are much cast down and afflicted for the ill opinion he entertains of you, and the disquietudes he himself suffers for your sake. There are many who take a kind of barbarous

barbarous pleasure in the Jealousy of those who love them, that insult over an aking heart, and triumph in their charms which are able to excite so much uneasiness.

Ardeat ipsa licet, tormentis gaudet amantis.

Juv. Sat. 6. v. 208.

Though equal pains her peace of mind destroy,
A Lover's torments give her spiteful joy.

But these often carry the humour so far, until their affected coldness and indifference quite kills all the fondness of a Lover, and are then sure to meet in their turn with all the contempt and scorn that is due to so insolent a behaviour. On the contrary, it is very probable a melancholy, dejected carriage, the usual effects of injured innocence, may soften the jealous husband into pity, make him sensible of the wrong he does you, and work out of his mind all those fears and suspicions that make you both unhappy. At least it will have this good effect, that he will keep his Jealousy to himself, and repine in private, either because he is sensible it is a weakness, and will therefore hide it from your knowledge, or because he will be apt to fear some ill effect it may produce, in cooling your love towards him, or diverting it to another.

There is still another secret that can never fail, if you can once get it believed, and which is often practised by women of greater cunning than virtue: This is to change sides for a while with the jealous man, and to turn his own passion sion upon himself; to take some occasion of growing jealous of him, and to follow the example he himself hath set you. This counterfeited Jealousy will bring him a great deal of pleasure, if he thinks it real; for he knows experimentally how much love goes along with this passion, and will besides feel something like the satisfaction of a revenge, in seeing you undergo all his own tortures. But this, indeed, is an artifice so difficult, and at the same time so disingenuous, that it ought never to be put in practice, but by such as have skill enough to cover the deceit, and innocence to render it excusable.

I shall conclude this essay with the story of Herod and Mariamne, as I have collected it out of Josephus; which may serve almost as an example to whatever can be said on this subject.

Mariamne had all the charms that beauty, birth, wit and youth could give a woman, and Herod all the love that such charms are able to raise in a warm and amorous disposition. In the midst of this his fondness for Mariamne, he put her brother to death, as he did her father not many years after. The barbarity of the action was represented to Mark Antony, who immediately summoned Herod into Egypt, to answer for the crime that was there laid to his charge. Herod attributed the summons to Antony's desire of Mariamne, whom therefore, before his departure, he gave into the custody of his uncle Joseph, with private orders to put her to death, if any such violence was offered to himself. This
Joseph

Joseph was much delighted with Mariamne's conversation, and endeavoured with all his art and rhetoric, to set out the excess of Herod's passion for her; but when he still found her cold and incredulous, he inconsiderately told her, as a certain instance of her Lord's affection, the private orders he had left behind him, which plainly shewed, according to Joseph's interpretation, that he could neither live nor die without her. This barbarous instance of a wild unreasonable passion quite put out for a time, those little remains of affection she had still for her Lord: Her thoughts were so wholly taken up with the cruelty of his orders, that she could not consider the kindness that produced them, and therefore represented him in her imagination, rather under the frightful idea of a Murderer than a Lover. Herod was at length acquitted and dismissed by Mark Antony, when his soul was all in flames for his Mariamne; but before their meeting, he was not a little alarmed at the report he had heard of his uncle's conversation and familiarity with her in his absence. This therefore was the first discourse he entertained her with, in which she found it no easy matter to quiet his suspicions. But at last he appeared so well satisfied of her innocence, that from reproaches and wranglings he fell to tears and embraces. Both of them wept very tenderly at their reconciliation, and Herod poured out his whole soul to her in the warmest protestations of love and constancy; when amidst all his sighs and languishings she asked him, whether the private

private orders he left with his uncle Joseph were an instance of such an inflamed affection. The jealous King was immediately roused at so unexpected a question, and concluded his uncle must have been too familiar with her, before he would have discovered such a secret. In short, he put his uncle to death, and very difficultly prevailed upon himself to spare Mariamne.

After this he was forced on a second journey into Egypt, when he committed his Lady to the care of Sobemus, with the same private orders he had before given his uncle, if any mischief befel himself. In the mean while Mariamne so won upon Sobemus by her presents and obliging conversation, that she drew all the secret from him, with which Herod had intrusted him; so that after his return, when he flew to her with all the transports of joy and love, she received him coldly with sighs and tears, and all the marks of indifference and aversion. This reception so stirred up his indignation, that he had certainly slain her with his own hands, had not he feared he himself should have become the greater sufferer by it. It was not long after this, when he had another violent return of love upon him; Mariamne was therefore sent for to him, whom he endeavoured to soften and reconcile with all possible conjugal caresses and endearments; but she declined his embraces, and answered all his fondness with bitter invectives for the death of her father and her brother. This behaviour so incensed Herod, that he very hardly refrained from striking her; when in the heat of their quarrel
there

there came in a witness, suborned by some of Mariamme's enemies, who accused her to the King of a design to poison him. Herod was now prepared to hear any thing in her prejudice, and immediately ordered her servant to be stretched upon the rack; who in the extremity of his tortures confessed, that his mistress's aversion to the King arose from something Sobemus had told her; but as for any design of poisoning, he utterly disowned the least knowledge of it. This confession quickly proved fatal to Sobemus, who now lay under the same suspicions and sentence that Joseph had before him on the like occasion. Nor would Herod rest here; but accused her with great vehemence of a design upon his life, and by his authority with the Judges had her publicly condemned and executed. Herod soon after her death grew melancholy and dejected, retiring from the public administration of affairs into a solitary forest, and there abandoning himself to all the black considerations, which naturally arise from a passion made up of love, remorse, pity and despair. He used to rave for his Mariamme, and to call upon her in his distracted fits; and in all probability would soon have followed her, had not his thoughts been seasonably called off from so sad an object by public storms, which at that time very nearly threatened him.

L

N^o 172 Monday, September 17.

Non solum scientia, quæ est remota à justitia, calliditas potius quam sapientia est appellanda; verum etiam animus paratus ad periculum, si suâ cupiditate, non utilitate communi, impellitur, audaciæ potius nomen habeat, quàm fortitudinis— Plato apud Tull.

As knowledge, without justice, ought to be called cunning, rather than wisdom; so a mind prepared to meet danger, if excited by its own eagerness, and not the public good, deserves the name of audacity, rather than of courage.

THERE can be no greater injury to human society, than that good talents among men should be held honourable to those who are endowed with them, without any regard how they are applied. The gifts of nature and accomplishments of art are valuable, but as they are exerted in the interests of virtue, or governed by the rules of honour. We ought to abstract our minds from the observation of an excellence in those we converse with, until we have taken some notice, or received some good information of the disposition of their minds; otherwise the beauty of their persons, or the charms of their wit, may make us fond of those whom our reason and judgment will tell us we ought to abhor.

When we suffer ourselves to be thus carried away by mere beauty, or mere wit, Omni-amante, with all her vice, will bear away as much of our good-will as the most innocent virgin or discreet matron; and there cannot be a more abject slavery in this world, than to dote upon what we think we ought to condemn; Yet this must be our condition in all the parts of life, if we suffer ourselves to approve any thing but what tends to the promotion of what is good and honourable. If we would take true pains with ourselves to consider all things by the light of reason and justice, though a man were in the height of youth and amorous inclinations, he would look upon a Coquette with the same contempt or indifference as he would upon a Coxcomb: The wanton carriage in a woman would disappoint her of the admiration which she aims at; and the vain dress or discourse of a man would destroy the comeliness of his shape, or goodness of his understanding. I say the goodness of his understanding, for it is no less common to see men of Sense commence Coxcombs, than beautiful women to become immodest. When this happens in either, the favour we are naturally inclined to give to the good qualities they have from nature should abate in proportion. But however just it is to measure the value of men by the application of their talents, and not by the eminence of those qualities abstracted from their use; I say, however just such a way of judging is, in all ages as well as this, the contrary has prevailed upon the generality of mankind. How many lewd devices have been preserved from one age to another, which had perished as soon as they were made, if Painters and Sculptors had been esteemed as much for the purpose as the execution of their designs? Modest and well-governed imaginations have by this means lost the representations of ten thousand charming portraitures, filled with images of innate truth, generous zeal, courageous faith, and tender humanity; instead of which, satyrs, furies, and monsters are recommended by those arts to a shameful eternity.
the

The unjust application of laudable talents, is tolerated, in the general opinion of men, not only in such cases as are here mentioned, but also in matters which concern ordinary life. If a Lawyer were to be esteemed only as he uses his parts in contending for justice, and were immediately despicable when he appeared in a cause which he could not but know was an unjust one, how honourable would his character be? And how honourable is it in such among us, who follow the profession no otherwise, than as labouring to protect the injured, to subdue the oppressor, to imprison the careless debtor, and do right to the painful artificer? But many of this excellent character are overlooked by the greater number; who affect covering a weak place in a client's title, diverting the course of an inquiry, or finding a skilful refuge to palliate a falsehood: Yet it is still called eloquence in the latter, though thus unjustly employed: But resolution in an assassin is according to reason quite as laudable, as knowledge and wisdom exercised in the defence of an ill cause.

Were the intention stedfastly considered, as the measure of approbation, all falshood would soon be out of countenance: and an address in imposing upon mankind, would be as contemptible in one state of life as another. A couple of Courtiers making professions of esteem, would make the same figure after breach of promise, as two Knights of the Post convicted of perjury. But conversation is fallen so low in point of morality, that as they say in a bargain, 'Let the buyer look to it;' so in friendship, He is the man in danger who is most apt to believe: He is the more likely to suffer in the commerce, who begins with the obligation of being the more ready to enter into it.

But those men only are truly great, who place their ambition rather in acquiring to themselves the conscience of worthy enterprizes, than in the prospect of glory which attends them. These exalted spirits would rather be secretly the authors of events which are serviceable to mankind, than, without being such, to have the public fame of it. Where therefore an eminent merit is robbed by artifice or detraction, it does but increase by such endeavours of its enemies: The impotent pains which are taken to fully it, or diffuse it among a crowd to the injury of a single person, will naturally produce the contrary effect; the fire will blaze out, and burn up all that attempt to smother what they cannot extinguish.

There is but one thing necessary to keep the possession of true glory, which is, to hear the opposers of it with patience, and preserve the virtue by which it was acquired. When a man is thoroughly persuaded that he ought neither to admire, wish for, or pursue any thing but what is exactly his duty, it is not in the power of seasons, persons or accidents, to diminish his value. He only is a great man who can neglect the applause of the multitude, and enjoy himself independent of its favour. This is indeed an arduous task; but it should comfort a glorious spirit that it is the highest step to which human nature can arrive. Triumph, applause, acclamation, are dear to the mind of man; but it is still a more exquisite delight to say to yourself, you have done well, than to hear the whole human race pronounce you glorious, except you yourself can join with them in your own reflexions. A mind thus equal and uniform may be deserted by little fashionable admirers and followers, but will ever be had in reverence by Souls like itself. The Branches of the oak endure all the seasons of the year, though its leaves fall off in autumn; and these too will be restored with the returning spring.

T

N^o 173 Tuesday, September 18.

—Remove fera monstra, tueque Saxifcos vultus, quæcunque ea, tolle Medusa.

Ovid. Met. l. 5. v. 216.

Remove that horrid monster, and take hence Medusa's petrifying countenance.

IN a late Paper, I mentioned the project of an ingenious Author, for the erecting of several handicraft prizes to be contended for by our British Artisans, and the influence they might have towards the improvement of our several manufactures. I have since that been very much surpris'd by the following advertisement which I find in the Post-Boy of the 11th instant, and again repeated in the Post-Boy of the 15th.

‘ On the 9th of October next will be run for ‘ upon Coleshill-beath in Warwickshire, a plate of ‘ 6 guineas value, 3 heats, by any Horse, Mare ‘ or Gelding that hath not won above the value ‘ of 5*l.* the winning horse to be sold for 10*l.*
‘ to carry 10 stone weight, if 14 hands high;
‘ if above or under, to carry or be allowed weight ‘ for inches, and to be entered Friday the 5th ‘ at the Swan in Coleshill, before six in the ‘ evening.

‘ Alto

- ‘ Also a plate of less value to be run for by
- ‘ Asses. The same day a gold ring to be Grinned
- ‘ for by men.’

The first of these diversions that is to be exhibited by the 10*l*. Race-horses, may probably have its use; but the two last, in which the Asses and Men are concerned, seem to me altogether extraordinary and unaccountable. Why they should keep Running-asses at Coleshill, or how making mouths turns to account in Warwickshire, more than in any other parts of England, I cannot comprehend. I have looked over all the Olympic Games, and do not find any thing in them like an Ass-race, or a match at Grinning. However it be, I am informed that several Asses are now kept in body-clothes, and sweated every morning upon the heath, and that all the country-fellows within ten miles of the Swan, grin an hour or two in their glasses every morning, in order to qualify themselves for the 9th of October. The prize, which is proposed to be Grinned for, has raised such an ambition among the common-people of out-grinning one another, that many very discerning persons are afraid it should spoil most of the faces in the county; and that a Warwickshire man will be known by his Grin, as Roman-catholics imagine a Kentish man is by his Tail. The gold ring, which is made the prize of Deformity, is just the reverse of the golden apple that was formerly made the prize of Beauty, and should carry for its poesy the old motto inverted.

Detur tetrioni.

Or to accommodate it to the capacity of the combatants.

The frightfull'st Grinner
Be the winner.

In the mean while I would advise a Dutch Painter to be present at this great controversy of faces, in order to make a collection of the most remarkable Grins that shall be there exhibited.

I must not here omit an account which I lately received of one of these Grinning-matches from a Gentleman, who, upon reading the above-mentioned advertisement, entertained a Coffee-house with the following narrative. Upon the taking of Namur, amidst other public rejoicings made on that occasion, there was a gold ring given by a Whig Justice of the Peace to be Grinned for. The first competitor that entered the lists, was a black swarthy Frenchman, who accidentally passed that way, and being a man naturally of a withered look, and hard features, promised himself good success. He was placed upon a table in the great point of view, and looking upon the company like Milton's Death,

Grinn'd horribly a ghastly smile——

His muscles were so drawn together on each side of his face, that he shewed twenty teeth at a Grin, and put the country in some pain, lest a foreigner should carry away the honour of the day ; but upon a farther trial they found he was master only of the merry Grin.
of

The next that mounted the table was a male-content in those days, and a great master in the whole art of Grinning, but particularly excelled in the angry Grin. He did his part so well, that he is said to have made half a dozen women miscarry ; but the Justice being apprised by one who stood near him, that the fellow who grinned in his face was a Jacobite, and being unwilling that a disaffected person should win the gold ring, and be looked upon as the best Grinner in the country, he ordered the oaths to be tendered unto him upon his quitting the table, which the Grinner refusing, he was set aside as an unqualified person. There were several other grotesque figures that presented themselves, which it would be too tedious to describe. I must not however omit a Ploughman, who lived in the farther part of the country, and being very lucky in a pair of long lanthorn-jaws, wrung his face into such an hideous grimace, that every feature of it appeared under a different distortion. The whole company stood astonished at such a complicated Grin, and were ready to assign the prize to him, had it not been proved by one of his antagonists, that he had practised with verjuice for some days before, and had a crab found upon him at the very time of Grinning ; upon which the best judges of Grinning declared it as their opinion, that he was not to be looked upon as a fair Grinner, Grinner, and therefore ordered him to be set aside as a cheat.

The prize, it seems, fell at length upon a Cöbler, Giles Gorgon by name, who produced several new Grins of his own invention, having been used to cut faces for many years together over his Last. At the very first Grin he cast every human feature out of his countenance, at the second he became the face of a spout, at the third a baboon, at the fourth the head of a bass-viol, and at the fifth a pair of nut-crackers. The whole assembly wondered at his accomplishments, and bestowed the Ring on him unanimously; but, what he esteemed more than all the rest, a country-wench, whom he had wooed in vain for above five years before, was so charmed with his Grins, and the applauses which he received on all sides, that she married him the week following, and to this day wears the prize upon her finger, the Cöbler having made use of it as his wedding-ring.

This Paper might perhaps seem very impertinent, if it grew serious in the conclusion. I would nevertheless leave it to the consideration of those who are the patrons of this monstrous trial of skill, whether or no they are not guilty, in some measure, of an affront to their species, in treating after this manner the ‘human face divine,’ and turning that part of us, which has so great an image impressed upon it, into the image of a monkey; whether the raising such silly competitions among the ignorant, proposing prizes for such useless accomplishments, filling filling the common peoples heads with such senseless ambitions, and inspiring them with such absurd ideas of superiority and preeminence, has not in it something immoral as well as ridiculous.

L

N^o 174 Wednesday, September 19.

Hæc memini & victum frustra contendere Thyrsin.

Virg. Ecl. 7. v. 69.

These rhymes I did to memory commend,
When vanquish'd Thyrsis did in vain contend.

DRYDEN.

THERE is scarce any thing more common than animosities between parties that cannot subsist but by their agreement: This was well represented in the sedition of the members of the human body in the old Roman fable. It is often the case of lesser confederate states against a superior power, which are hardly held together, though their unanimity is necessary for their common safety: And this is always the case of the landed and trading interest of Great Britain: The Trader is fed by the product of the land, and the landed man cannot be clothed but by the skill of the Trader; and yet those interests are ever jarring.

We had last winter an instance of this at our Club, in Sir ROGER DE COVERLEY and
Sir

Sir ANDREW FREEPORT, between whom there is generally a constant, though friendly, opposition of opinions. It happened that one of the company, in an historical discourse, was observing, that Carthaginian faith was a proverbial phrase to intimate breach of leagues. Sir ROGER said it could hardly be otherwise: That the Carthaginians were the greatest traders in the world; and as gain is the chief end of such a people, they never pursue any other: The means to it are never regarded; they will, if it comes easily, get money honestly; but if not, they will not scruple to attain it by fraud or cozenage: And indeed, what is the whole business of the Trader's account, but to overreach him who trusts to his memory? But were that not so, what can there great and noble be expected from him whose attention is for ever fixed upon balancing his books, and watching over his expences? And at best, let frugality and parsimony be the virtues of the Merchant, how much is his punctual dealing below a Gentleman's charity to the poor, or hospitality among his neighbours?

CAPTAIN SENTRY observed Sir ANDREW very diligent in hearing Sir ROGER, and had a mind to turn the discourse, by taking notice in general, from the highest to the lowest parts of human society, there was a secret, though unjust, way among men, of indulging the seeds of ill-nature and envy, by comparing their own state of life to that of another, and grudging the approach of their neighbour to their own happiness; happiness; and on the other side, he, who is the less at his ease, repines at the other, who, he thinks, has unjustly the advantage over him. Thus the civil and military lists look upon each other with much ill-nature; the Soldier repines at the Courtier's power, and the Courtier rallies the Soldier's honour; or, to come to lower instances, the private men in the horse and foot of an army, the carmen and coachmen in the city streets, mutually look upon each other with ill-will, when they are in competition for quarters or the way, in their respective motions.

It is very well, good Captain, interrupted Sir ANDREW: You may attempt to turn the discourse if you think fit; but I must however have a word or two with Sir ROGER, who, I see, thinks he has paid me off, and been very severe upon the Merchant. I shall not, continued he, at this time remind Sir ROGER of the great and noble monuments of charity and public spirit, which have been erected by Merchants since the reformation, but at present content myself with what he allows us, parsimony and frugality. If it were consistent with the quality of so ancient a Baronet as Sir ROGER, to keep an accompt, or measure things by the most infallible way, that of numbers, he would prefer our parsimony to his hospitality. If to drink so many hogheads is to be hospitable, we do not contend for the fame of that virtue; but it would be worth while to consider, whether so many artificers at work ten days together by my appointment, or so many peasants made merry on Sir ROGER's charge, are the men more obliged? I believe the families of the artificers will thank me, more than the household of the peasants shall Sir ROGER. Sir ROGER gives to his men, but I place mine above the necessity or obligation of my bounty. I am in very little pain for the Roman proverb upon the Carthaginian Traders; the Romans were their professed enemies: I am only sorry no Carthaginian histories have come to our hands; we might have been taught perhaps by them some proverbs against the Roman generosity, in fighting for and bestowing other people's goods. But since Sir ROGER has taken occasion from an old proverb to be out of humour with Merchants, it should be no offence to offer one not quite so old in their defence. When a man happens to break in Holland, they say of him that 'he has not kept true accounts.' This phrase, perhaps, among us, would appear a soft or humorous way of speaking, but with that exact nation it bears the highest reproach; for a man to be mistaken in the calculation of his expence, in his ability to answer future demands, or to be impertinently sanguine in putting his credit to too great adventure, are all instances of as much infamy as with gayer nations to be failing in courage or common honesty.
at

Numbers are so much the measure of every thing that is valuable, that it is not possible to demonstrate

demonstrate the success of any action, or the prudence of any undertaking without them. I say this in answer to what Sir ROGER is pleased to say, that little that is truly noble can be expected from one who is ever poring on his cash-book, or balancing his accompts. When I have my returns from abroad, I can tell to a shilling, by the help of numbers, the profit or loss by my adventure; but I ought also to be able to shew that I had reason for making it, either from my own experience, or that of other people, or from a reasonable presumption that my returns will be sufficient to answer my expence and hazard; and this is never to be done without the skill of numbers. For instance, if I am to trade to Turkey, I ought beforehand to know the demand of our manufactures there, as well as of their silks in England, and the customary prices that are given for both in each country. I ought to have a clear knowledge of these matters beforehand, that I may presume upon sufficient returns to answer the charge of the cargo I have fitted out, the freight and assurance out and home, the customs to the Queen, and the interest of my own money, and besides all these expences a reasonable profit to myself. Now what is there of scandal in this skill? What has the Merchant done, that he should be so little in the good graces of Sir ROGER? He throws down no man's inclosures, and tramples upon no man's corn; he takes nothing from the industrious labourer; he he pays the poor man for his work; he communicates his profit with mankind; by the preparation of his cargo, and the manufacture of his returns, he furnishes employment and subsistence to greater numbers than the richest Nobleman; and even the Nobleman is obliged to him for finding out foreign markets for the produce of his estate, and for making a great addition to his rents; and yet it is certain, that none of all these things could be done by him without the exercise of his skill in numbers.

This is the oeconomy of the Merchant; and the conduct of the Gentleman must be the same, unless by scorning to be the Steward, he resolves the Steward shall be the Gentleman. The Gentleman, no more than the Merchant, is able, without the help of numbers, to account for the success of any action, or the prudence of any adventure. If, for instance, the Chace is his whole adventure, his only returns must be the Stag's horns in the great hall, and the Fox's nose upon the stable-door. Without doubt Sir ROGER knows the full value of these returns; and if beforehand he had computed the charges of the chace, a Gentleman of his discretion would certainly have hanged up all his dogs, he would never have brought back so many fine horses to the kennel, he would never have gone so often, like a blast, over fields of corn. If such too had been the conduct of all his ancestors, he might truly have boasted at this day that the antiquity of his family had never been sullied by a trade; a Merchant had never been permitted with his whole estate to purchase a room for his picture in the gallery of the COVERLEYS, or to claim his descent from the Maid of Honour. But it is very happy for Sir ROGER that the Merchant paid so dear for his ambition. It is the misfortune of many other Gentlemen to turn out of the seats of their ancestors, to make way for such new masters as have been more exact in their accompts than themselves; and certainly he deserves the estate a great deal better, who has got it by his industry, than he who has lost it by his negligence. T.
antiquity

N^o 175 Thursday, September 20.

Proximus à tectis ignis defenditur ægrè:—

Ovid. Rem. Am. v. 625.

To save your house from neighb'ring fire is hard.

TATE.

I Shall this day entertain my readers with two or three Letters I have received from my correspondents: The first discovers to me a species of Females which have hitherto escaped my notice, and is as follows.

MR. SPECTATOR,

I Am a young Gentleman of a competent fortune, and a sufficient taste of learning, to spend five or six hours every day very agreeably among my books. That I might have nothing to divert me from my studies, and to avoid the noises of coaches and chairmen, I have taken lodgings in a very narrow street not far from Whitehall; but it is my misfortune to be so posted, that my lodgings are directly opposite to those of a Jezebel. You are to know, Sir, that a Jezebel (so called by the neighbourhood from displaying her pernicious charms at her window) appears constantly dressed at her sash, and has a thousand little tricks and fooleries to attract the eyes of all the idle young fellows in the neighbourhood. I have seen more than six persons at once from their several windows observing the Jezebel I am now complaining of. I at first looked on her myself with the highest contempt, could divert myself with her airs for half an hour, and afterwards take up my Plutarch with great tranquillity of mind; but was a little vexed to find that in less than a month she had considerably stolen upon my time, so that I resolved to look at her no more. But the Jezebel, who, as I suppose, might think it a diminution to her honour, to have the number of her gazers lessened, resolved not to part with me so, and began to play so many new tricks at her window, that it was

‘ was impossible for me to forbear observing ‘ her. I verily believe she put herself to the ‘ expence of a new wax baby on purpose to ‘ plague me; she used to dandle and play with ‘ this figure as impertinently as if it had been ‘ a real child: Sometimes she would let fall ‘ a glove or a pin-cushion in the street, and ‘ shut or open her casement three or four times ‘ in a minute. When I had almost weaned ‘ myself from this, she came in her shift-sleeves,
‘ and dressed at the window. I had no way ‘ left but to let down my curtains, which I ‘ submitted to though it considerably darkened ‘ my room, and was pleased to think that I ‘ had at last got the better of her; but was ‘ surprized the next morning to hear her talking ‘ out of her window quite cross the street, with ‘ another woman that lodges over me: I am ‘ since informed, that she made her a visit,
‘ and got acquainted with her within three ‘ hours after the fall of my window-curtains.

‘ Sir, I am plagued every moment in the ‘ day, one way or other, in my own chambers;
‘ and the Jezebel has the satisfaction to know,
‘ that though I am not looking at her, I am ‘ listening to her impertinent dialogues that pass ‘ over my head. I would immediately change ‘ my lodgings, but that I think it might look ‘ like a plain confession that I am conquered;
‘ and besides this, I am told that most quarters ‘ of the town are infested with these creatures.
‘ If they are so, I am sure it is such an abuse,

‘ as a lover of learning and silence ought to ‘ take notice of.

I am, Sir,

Yours, &c.

I am afraid, by some lines in this Letter, that my young student is touched with a distemper which he hardly seems to dream of, and is too far gone in it to receive advice. However, I shall animadvert in due time on the abuse which he mentions, having myself observed a nest of Jezebels near the Temple, who make it their diversion to draw up the eyes of young Templars, that at the same time they may see them stumble in an unlucky gutter which runs under the window.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

‘ I Have lately read the conclusion of your ‘ forty-seventh Speculation upon Butts with ‘ great pleasure, and have ever since been ‘ thoroughly persuaded that one of those Gen‘ tlemen is extremely necessary to enliven con‘ versation. I had an entertainment last week ‘ upon the water for a Lady to whom I make ‘ my addressees, with several of our friends of ‘ both Sexes. To divert the company in ge‘ neral, and to shew my mistress in particular ‘ my genius for rallery, I took one of the most ‘ celebrated Butts in town along with me. It ‘ is with the utmost shame and confusion that ‘ I must acquaint you with the sequel of my adven-

‘ adventure: As soon as we were got into the ‘ boat, I played a sentence or two at my Butt
‘ which I thought very smart, when my ill ge‘ nius, who I verily believe inspired him purely ‘ for my destruction, suggested to him such a ‘ reply, as got all the laughter on his side. I ‘ was dashed on so unexpected a turn; which ‘ the Butt perceiving, resolved not to let me re‘ cover myself, and pursuing his victory, rallied ‘ and tossed me in a most unmerciful and barba‘ rous manner until we came to Chelfea. I had ‘ some small success while we were eating cheese‘ cakes; but coming home, he renewed his ‘ attacks with his former good-fortune, and ‘ equal diversion to the whole company. In ‘ short, Sir, I must ingenuously own that I was ‘ never so handled in all my life; and, to com‘ plete my misfortune, I am since told that the ‘ Butt, flushed with his late victory, has made ‘ a visit or two to the dear object of my wishes, ‘ so that I am at once in danger of losing all my ‘ pretensions to wit, and my mistress into the ‘ bargain. This, Sir, is a true account of my ‘ present troubles, which you are the more obliged ‘ to assist me in, as you were yourself in a great ‘ measure the cause of them, by recommending ‘ to us an Instrument, and not instructing us at ‘ the same time how to play upon it.

‘ I have been thinking whether it might not ‘ be highly convenient, that all Butts should wear ‘ an inscription affixed to some part of their bo‘ dies, shewing on which side they are to be ‘ come at, and that if any of them are persons

‘ of unequal tempers, there should be some method taken to inform the world at what time it is safe to attack them, and when you had best let them alone. But, submitting these matters to your more serious consideration,

I am, Sir,

Yours, &c.

I have, indeed, seen and heard of several young Gentlemen under the same misfortune with my present correspondent. The best rule I can lay down for them to avoid the like calamities for the future, is throughly to consider not only whether their companions are weak, but whether themselves are wits.

The following letter comes to me from Exeter, and being credibly informed that what it contains is matter of fact, I shall give it my reader as it was sent me.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

Exeter, Sept. 7.

‘ YOU were pleased in a late Speculation ‘ to take notice of the inconvenience we ‘ lie under in the country, in not being able to ‘ keep pace with the fashion: But there is another misfortune which we are subject to, and ‘ is no less grievous than the former, which ‘ has hitherto escaped your observation. I mean, ‘ the having things palmed upon us for London ‘ fashions, which were never once heard of ‘ there.

‘ A Lady of this place had some time since a box of the newest ribbons sent down by the ‘ coach:

‘ coach : Whether it was her own malicious invention, or the wantonness of a London milliner, I am not able to inform you ; but, among the rest, there was one cherry-coloured ribbon, consisting of about half a dozen yards, made up in the figure of a small head-dress. The aforesaid Lady had the assurance to affirm, amidst a circle of female inquisitors, who were present at the opening of the box, that this was the newest fashion worn at Court. Accordingly the next Sunday we had several females, who came to church with their heads dressed wholly in ribbons, and looked like so many victims ready to be sacrificed. This is still a reigning mode among us. At the same time we have a set of Gentlemen who take the liberty to appear in all publick places without any buttons to their coats, which they supply with several little silver hasps, though our freshest advices from London make no mention of any such fashion ; and we are something shy of affording matter to the button-makers for a second petition.

‘ What I would humbly propose to the publick is, that there may be a society erected in London, to consist of the most skilful persons of both sexes, for the inspection of modes and fashions ; and that hereafter no person or persons shall presume to appear singularly habited in any part of the country, without a testimonial from the aforesaid society, that their dress is answerable to the mode at London.

‘ By this means, Sir, we shall know a little ‘ whereabouts we are.

‘ If you could bring this matter to bear, you ‘ would very much oblige great numbers of ‘ your country friends, and among the rest,

X Your very humble servant,
Jack Modish.

N^o 176 Friday, September 21.

Parvula, pumilio, χαρίτων μία, tota merum sal.

Lucr. l. 4. v. 1155.

A little, pretty, witty, charming she!

THERE are in the following letter matters, which I, a bachelor, cannot be supposed to be acquainted with; therefore shall not pretend to explain upon it until farther consideration, but leave the author of the Epistle to express his condition his own way.

MR. SPECTATOR,

‘ I Do not deny but you appear in many of ‘ your Papers to understand human life ‘ pretty well; but there are very many things ‘ which you cannot possibly have a true notion ‘ of, in a single life; these are such as respect the ‘ married state; otherwise I cannot account for ‘ your having overlooked a very good sort of ‘ people

‘ people, which are commonly called in scorn the ‘ Hen-peckt. You are to understand that I am one ‘ of those innocent mortals who suffer derision ‘ under that word, for being governed by the best ‘ of wives. It would be worth your consideration ‘ to enter into the nature of affection itself, and ‘ tell us, according to your philosophy, why it is ‘ that our Dears should do what they will with us, ‘ shall be froward, ill-natured, assuming, some‘ times whine, at others rail, then swoon away, ‘ then come to life, have the use of speech to ‘ the greatest fluency imaginable, and then sink ‘ away again, and all because they fear we do ‘ not love them enough; that is, the poor things ‘ love us so heartily, that they cannot think it ‘ possible we should be able to love them in so ‘ great a degree, which makes them take on so.
‘ I say, Sir, a true good-natured man, whom ‘ rakes and libertines call Hen-peckt, shall fall ‘ into all these different moods with his dear Life, ‘ and at the same time see they are wholly put on;
‘ and yet not be hard-hearted enough to tell the ‘ dear good creature that she is an hypocrite.

‘ This sort of good men is very frequent in ‘ the populous and wealthy city of London, and ‘ is the true Hen-peckt man; the kind creature ‘ cannot break through his kindneses so far as to ‘ come to an explanation with the tender Soul, ‘ and therefore goes on to comfort her when ‘ nothing ails her, to appease her when she is ‘ not angry, and to give her his cash when he ‘ knows she does not want it; rather than be ‘ uneasy for a whole month, which is computed by

‘ by hard-hearted men the space of time which ‘ a froward woman takes to come to herself, if ‘ you have courage to stand out.

‘ There are indeed several other species of ‘ the Hen-peckt, and in my opinion they are ‘ certainly the best subjects the Queen has; and ‘ for that reason I take it to be your duty to ‘ keep us above contempt.

‘ I do not know whether I make myself ‘ understood in the representation of an Hen-‘ peckt life, but I shall take leave to give you an ‘ account of myself, and my own spouse. You ‘ are to know that I am reckoned no fool, have on ‘ several occasions been tried whether I will take ‘ ill-usage, and the event has been to my ad‘ vantage; and yet there is not such a slave in ‘ Turkey as I am to my dear. She has a good ‘ share of wit, and is what you call a very pretty ‘ agreeable woman. I perfectly doat on her,
‘ and my affection to her gives me all the anx‘ ieties imaginable but that of Jealousy. My ‘ being thus confident of her, I take, as much ‘ as I can judge of my heart, to be the reason, ‘ that whatever she does, though it be never so ‘ much against my inclination, there is still left ‘ something in her manner that is amiable. She ‘ will sometimes look at me with an assumed ‘ grandeur, and pretend to resent that I have ‘ not had respect enough for her opinion in ‘ such an instance in company. I cannot but ‘ smile at the pretty anger she is in, and then she ‘ pretends she is used like a child. In a word, ‘ our great debate is, which has the superiority in ‘ point

‘ point of understanding. She is eternally forming an argument of debate; to which I very indolently answer, thou art mighty pretty. To this she answers, all the world but you think I have as much sense as yourself. I repeat to her, indeed you are pretty. Upon this there is no patience; she will throw down any thing about her, stamp and pull off her head-clothes. Fy, my dear, say I; how can a woman of your sense fall into such an intemperate rage? This is an argument which never fails. Indeed, my dear, says she, you make me mad sometimes, so you do, with the silly way you have of treating me like a pretty idiot. Well, what have I got by putting her into good-humour? Nothing, but that I must convince her of my good opinion by my practice; and then I am to give her possession of my little ready-money, and, for a day and a half following, dislike all she dislikes, and extol every thing she approves. I am so exquisitely fond of this Darling, that I seldom see any of my friends, am uneasy in all companies until I see her again; and when I come home, she is in the dumps, because she says she is sure I came so soon only because I think her handsome. I dare not upon this occasion laugh; but though I am one of the warmest churchmen in the kingdom, I am forced to rail at the times, because she is a violent Whig. Upon this we talk politicks so long, that she is convinced I kiss her for her wisdom. It is a common practice with me to ask her some ‘ question

‘ question concerning the constitution, which she ‘ answers me in general out of Harrington’s
‘ Oceana: Then I commend her strange me‘ mory, and her arm is immediately locked in ‘ mine. While I keep her in this temper she ‘ plays before me, sometimes dancing in the ‘ midst of the room, sometimes striking an air ‘ at her spinnet, varying her posture and her ‘ charms in such a manner that I am in continual ‘ pleasure: She will play the fool, if I allow her ‘ to be wife; but if she suspects I like her for ‘ her trifling, she immediately grows grave.

‘ These are the toils in which I am taken, and ‘ I carry off my servitude as well as most men; ‘ but my application to you is in behalf of the ‘ Hen-peckt in general, and I desire a dissertation ‘ from you in defence of us. You have, as I ‘ am informed, very good authorities in our fa‘ vour, and hope you will not omit the mention ‘ of the renowned Socrates, and his philosophic ‘ resignation to his wife Xantippe. This would ‘ be a very good office to the world in general, ‘ for the Hen-peckt are powerful in their quality ‘ and numbers, not only in cities but in Courts; ‘ in the latter they are ever the most obsequious, ‘ in the former the most wealthy of all men.
‘ When you have considered Wedlock tho‘ roughly, you ought to enter into the suburbs ‘ of Matrimony, and give us an account of the ‘ thralldom of kind keepers, and irresolute lovers;
‘ the keepers who cannot quit their fair ones, ‘ though they see their approaching ruin; the ‘ lovers who dare not marry, though they know ‘ they

‘ they never shall be happy without the mistresses ‘ whom they cannot purchase on other terms.

‘ What will be a great embellishment to ‘ your discourse, will be, that you may find ‘ instances of the haughty, the proud, the frolic, ‘ the stubborn, who are each of them in secret ‘ downright slaves to their wives or mistresses:
 ‘ I must beg of you in the last place to dwell ‘ upon this, that the wife and valiant in all ages ‘ have been Hen-peckt: And that the sturdy ‘ tempers who are not slaves to affection, owe ‘ that exemption to their being enthralled by am‘ bition, avarice, or some meaner passion. I ‘ have ten thousand thousand things more to say, ‘ but my wife sees me writing, and will, ac‘ cording to custom, be consulted, if I do not ‘ seal this immediately.

Yours,

T

Nathaniel Henrooft.

Saturday,

N^o 177 Saturday, September 22.

— Quis enim bonus, aut face dignus Arcanâ, qualem Cereris vult esse sacerdos, Ulla aliena sibi credat mala?— Juv. Sat. 15. v. 140.

Who can all sense of others ills escape,
Is but a brute, at best, in human shape. T A T E.

I N one of my last week's Papers I treated of Good-nature, as it is the effect of constitution; I shall now speak of it as it is a moral virtue. The first may make a man easy in himself and agreeable to others, but implies no merit in him that is possessed of it. A man is no more to be praised upon this account, than because he has a regular pulse or a good digestion. This Good-nature however in the constitution, which Mr. Dryden somewhere calls a 'milkeness of blood,' is an admirable groundwork for the other. In order therefore to try our Good-nature, whether it arises from the body or the mind, whether it be founded in the animal or rational part of our nature; in a word, whether it be such as is intitled to any other reward, besides that secret satisfaction and contentment of mind which is essential to it, and the kind reception it procures us in the world, we must examine it by the following rules.

First

First, whether it acts with steadiness and uniformity in sickness and in health, in prosperity and in adversity; if otherwise, it is to be looked upon as nothing else but an irradiation of the mind from some new supply of spirits, or a more kindly circulation of the blood. Sir Francis Bacon mentions a cunning Solicitor, who would never ask a favour of a great man before dinner; but took care to prefer his petition at a time when the party petitioned had his mind free from care, and his appetites in good humour. Such a transient temporary Good-nature as this, is not that Philanthropy, that love of mankind, which deserves the title of a moral virtue.

The next way of a man's bringing his Good-nature to the test, is, to consider whether it operates according to the rules of reason and duty: For if, notwithstanding its general benevolence to mankind, it makes no distinction between its objects, if it exerts itself promiscuously towards the deserving and undeserving, if it relieves alike the idle and the indigent, if it gives itself up to the first petitioner, and lights upon any one rather by accident than choice, it may pass for an amiable instinct, but must not assume the name of a moral virtue.

The third trial of Good-nature will be, the examining ourselves, whether or no we are able to exert it to our own disadvantage, and employ it on proper objects, notwithstanding any little pain, want, or inconvenience which may arise to ourselves from it: In a word, whether we

we are willing to risk any part of our fortune, our reputation, or health or ease, for the benefit of mankind. Among all these expressions of Good-nature, I shall single out that which goes under the general name of Charity, as it consists in relieving the indigent; that being a trial of this kind which offers itself to us almost at all times and in every place.

I should propose it as a rule to every one who is provided with any competency of fortune more than sufficient for the necessities of life, to lay aside a certain proportion of his income for the use of the poor. This I would look upon as an offering to Him who has a right to the whole, for the use of those whom, in the passage hereafter mentioned, he has described as his own representatives upon earth. At the same time we should manage our Charity with such prudence and caution, that we may not hurt our own friends or relations, whilst we are doing good to those who are strangers to us.

This may possibly be explained better by an example than by a rule.

Eugenius is a man of an universal Good-nature, and generous beyond the extent of his fortune; but withal so prudent, in the oeconomy of his affairs, that what goes out in Charity is made up by good Management. Eugenius has what the world calls two hundred pounds a year; but never values himself above nineſcore, as not thinking he has a right to the tenth part, which he always appropriates to charitable ritable uses. To this sum he frequently makes other voluntary additions, insomuch that in a good year, for such he accounts those in which he has been able to make greater bounties than ordinary, he has given above twice that sum to the sickly and indigent. Eugenius prescribes to himself many particular days of fasting and abstinence, in order to increase his private bank of Charity, and sets aside what would be the current expences of those times for the use of the poor. He often goes a-foot where his business calls him, and at the end of his walk has given a shilling, which in his ordinary methods of expence would have gone for coach-hire, to the first necessitous person that has fallen in his way. I have known him, when he has been going to a Play or an Opera, divert the money which was designed for that purpose, upon an object of charity whom he has met with in the street; and afterwards pass his evening in a Coffee-house, or at a friend's fire-side, with much greater satisfaction to himself than he could have received from the most exquisite entertainments of the Theatre. By these means he is generous without impoverishing himself, and enjoys his estate by making it the property of others.

There are few men so cramped in their private affairs, who may not be charitable after this manner, without any disadvantage to themselves, or prejudice to their families. It is but sometimes sacrificing a diversion or convenience to the poor, and turning the usual course of our exinto a better channel. This is, I think, not only the most prudent and convenient, but the most meritorious piece of Charity, which we can put in practice. By this method we in some measure share the necessities of the poor at the same time that we relieve them, and make ourselves not only their patrons, but their fellow-sufferers.

Sir Thomas Brown, in the last part of his Religio Medici, in which he describes his Charity in several heroic instances, and with a noble heat of sentiments, mentions that verse in the Proverbs of Solomon, "He that giveth to the poor, lendeth to the Lord:" "There is more rhetoric in that one sentence, says he, than in a library of sermons: and indeed if those sentences were understood by the Reader, with the same emphasis as they are delivered by the Author, we needed not those volumes of instructions, but might be honest by an epitome."

This passage in Scripture is indeed wonderfully persuasive; but I think the same thought is carried much farther in the New Testament, where our Saviour tells us in the most pathetic manner, that he shall hereafter regard the clothing of the naked, the feeding of the hungry, and the visiting of the imprisoned, as offices done to himself, and reward them accordingly. Pursuant to those passages in Holy Scripture, I have somewhere met with the epitaph of a charitable man, which has very much pleased me. I cannot recollect the words, but the sense of it is to this purpose; What I spent I lost; what I possessed is left to others: what I gave away remains with me.

Since I am thus insensibly engaged in sacred Writ, I cannot forbear making an extract of several passages which I have always read with great delight in the book of Job. It is the account which that holy man gives of his behaviour in the days of his prosperity, and, if considered only as a human composition, is a finer picture of a charitable and good-natured man than is to be met with in any other Author.

‘ Oh that I were as in months past, as in the ‘ days when God preserved me: When his ‘ candle shined upon my head, and when by his ‘ light I walked through darkness: When the ‘ Almighty was yet with me: when my chil‘ dren were about me: When I washed my ‘ steps with butter, and the rock poured out ‘ rivers of oil.

‘ When the ear heard me, then it blessed me;
‘ and when the eye saw me, it gave witness ‘ to me. Because I delivered the poor that cried, ‘ and the fatherless, and him that had none to ‘ help him. The blessing of him that was ready ‘ to perish came upon me, and I caused the ‘ widow’s heart to sing for joy. I was eyes ‘ to the blind, and feet was I to the lame; I ‘ was a father to the poor, and the cause which ‘ I knew not I searched out. Did not I weep ‘ for him that was in trouble? was not my ‘ Soul grieved for the poor? Let me be weighed ‘ in an even balance, that God may know mine ‘ integrity. If I did despise the cause of my ‘ man-servant or of my maid-servant when they ‘ contended with me; what then shall I do ‘ when God riseth up? and when he visiteth, ‘ what shall I answer him? Did not he that ‘ made me in the womb, make him? and did ‘ not one fashion us in the womb? If I have ‘ withheld the poor from their desire, or have ‘ caused the eyes of the widow to fail, or ‘ have eaten my morsel myself alone, and the ‘ fatherless hath not eaten thereof: If I have ‘ seen any perish for want of clothing, or any ‘ poor without covering: If his loins have not ‘ blessed me, and if he were not warmed with ‘ the fleece of my sheep: If I have lift up my ‘ hand against the fatherless, when I saw my ‘ help in the gate? then let mine arm fall from ‘ my shoulder-blade, and mine arm be broken ‘ from the bone. If I have rejoiced at the de‘ struction of him that hated me, or lift up my‘ self when evil found him: (neither have I ‘ suffered my mouth to sin, by wishing a curse ‘ to his soul.) The stranger did not lodge in the ‘ street; but I opened my doors to the travel‘ ler. If my land cry against me, or that the ‘ furrows likewise thereof complain: If I have ‘ eaten the fruits thereof without money, or have ‘ caused the owners thereof to lose their life; Let ‘ thistles grow instead of wheat, and cockle in‘ stead of barley.’

L

Monday,

N^o 178 Monday, September 24.

Comis in uxorem ——— Hor. Ep. 2. 1. 2. v. 133.

Civil to his wife.

POPE.

I Cannot defer taking notice of this letter.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

I Am but too good a judge of your Paper of the 15th instant, which is a master-piece; I mean that of Jealousy: But I think it unworthy of you to speak of that torture in the breast of a man, and not to mention also the pangs of it in the heart of a woman. You have very judiciously, and with the greatest penetration imaginable, considered it as woman is the creature of whom the diffidence is raised: But not a word of a man, who is so unmerciful as to move Jealousy in his Wife, and not care whether she is so or not. It is possible you may not believe there are such tyrants in the world; but alas, I can tell you of a man who is ever out humour in his Wife's company, and the pleasantest man in the world every where else; the greatest sloven at home when he appears to none but his family, and most exactly well-dressed in all other places.

places. Alas, Sir, is it of course, that to deliver one's self wholly into a man's power without possibility of appeal to any other jurisdiction but his own reflections, is so little an obligation to a Gentleman, that he can be offended and fall into a rage, because my heart swells tears into my eyes when I see him in a cloudy mood? I pretend to no succour, and hope for no relief but from himself; and yet he that has sense and justice in every thing else, never reflects, that to come home only to sleep off an intemperance, and spend all the time he is there as if it were a punishment, cannot but give the anguish of a jealous mind. He always leaves his home as if he were going to Court, and returns as if he were entering a Goal. I could add to this, that from his company and his usual discourse, he does not scruple being thought an abandoned man, as to his morals. Your own imagination will say enough to you concerning the condition of me his Wife; and I wish you would be so good as to represent to him, for he is not ill-natured, and reads you much, that the moment I hear the door shut after him, I throw myself upon my bed, and drown the child he is so fond of with my tears, and often frighten it with my cries; that I curse my Being; that I run to my glass all over bathed in sorrows, and help the utterance of my inward anguish by beholding the gush of my own calamities as my tears fall from my eyes. This looks like an imagined picture to tell you, but indeed this is one
of

‘ of my pastimes. Hitherto I have only told ‘ you the general temper of my mind, but how ‘ shall I give you an account of the distraction ‘ of it? Could you but conceive how cruel I ‘ am one moment in my resentment, and at ‘ the ensuing minute, when I place him in the ‘ condition my anger would bring him to, ‘ how compassionate; it would give you some ‘ notion how miserable I am, and how little I ‘ deserve it. When I remonstrate with the ‘ greatest gentleness that is possible against un‘ handsom appearances, and that married persons ‘ are under particular rules; when he is in the ‘ best humour to receive this, I am answered ‘ only, that I expose my own reputation and ‘ sense if I appear jealous. I wish, good Sir, ‘ you would take this into serious consideration,
‘ and admonish husbands and wives what terms ‘ they ought to keep towards each other. Your ‘ thoughts on this important subject will have ‘ the greatest reward, that which descends on ‘ such as feel the sorrows of the afflicted. Give ‘ me leave to subscribe myself,

Your unfortunate

humble servant,

C E L I N D A.

I had it in my thoughts, before I received the letter of this Lady, to consider this dreadful passion in the mind of a Woman; and the smart she seems to feel does not abate the inclination I had to recommend to husbands a more regular behaviour, than to give the most exquisite of torments to those who love them, nay, whose torment would be abated if they did not love them.

It is wonderful to observe how little is made of this inexpressible injury, and how easily men get into an habit of being least agreeable where they are most obliged to be so. But this Subject deserves a distinct Speculation, and I shall observe for a day or two the behaviour of two or three happy pairs I am acquainted with, before I pretend to make a system of conjugal morality. I design, in the first place to go a few miles out of town, and there I know where to meet one who practises all the parts of a fine Gentleman in the duty of an husband. When he was a bachelor, much business made him particularly negligent in his habit; but now there is no young Lover living so exact in the care of his person. One who asked why he was so long washing his mouth, and so delicate in the choice and wearing of his linen, was answered, because there is a woman of merit-obliged to receive me kindly, and I think it incumbent upon me to make her inclination go along with her duty.

If a man would give himself leave to think, he would not be so unreasonable as to expect debauchery and innocence could live in commerce together; or hope that flesh and blood is capable of so strict an alliance, as that a fine woman must go on to improve herself until she is as good and impassive as an Angel, only to preserve a fidelity to a Brute and a Satyr. The Lady who desires me for her sake to end one of my Papers with the following letter, I am persuaded, thinks such a perseverance very impracticable.

Husband,

' STay more at home. I know where you
' visited at seven of the clock on Thursday
' evening. The Colonel, whom you charged
' me to see no more, is in town.

T

Martha Housewife.

N^o 179 Tuesday, September 25.

*Centuriæ seniorum agitant expertia frugis:
Celsi prætereunt austera poemata Rhannes.
Omne tulit punctum qui miscuit utile dulci, Lectorem delectando, pariterque monendo.*

Hor. Ars Poet. v. 341.

Old age explodes all but morality;
Austerity offends aspiring youth:
But he that joins instruction with delight,
Profit with pleasure, carries all the votes.

ROSCOMMON.

I May cast my readers under two general divisions, the Mercurial and the Saturnine. The first are the gay part of my disciples, who require Speculations of Wit and Humour; the others are those of a more solemn and sober turn, turn, who find no pleasure but in Papers of Morality and sound Sense. The former call every thing that is serious, stupid; the latter look upon every thing as impertinent that is ludicrous. Were I always grave, one half of my readers would fall off from me: Were I always merry, I should lose the other. I make it therefore my endeavour to find out entertainments of both kinds, and by that means perhaps consult the good of both, more than I should do, did I always write to the particular taste of either. As they neither of them know what I proceed upon, the sprightly reader, who takes up my Paper in order to be diverted, very often finds himself engaged unawares in a serious and profitable course of thinking; as on the contrary, the thoughtful man, who perhaps may hope to find something solid, and full of deep reflexion, is very often insensibly betrayed into a fit of mirth. In a word, the reader sits down to my entertainment without knowing his bill of fare, and has therefore at least the pleasure of hoping there may be a dish to his palate.

I must confess, were I left to myself, I should rather aim at instructing than diverting; but if we will be useful to the world, we must take it as we find it. Authors of professed severity discourage the looser part of mankind from having any thing to do with their writings. A man must have virtue in him, before he will enter upon the reading of a Seneca or an Epicætetus. The very title of a moral treatise has some-something in it austere and shocking to the careless and inconsiderate.

For this reason several unthinking persons fall in my way, who would give no attention to lectures delivered with a religious seriousness or a philosophic gravity. They are ensnared into sentiments of wisdom and virtue when they do not think of it; and if by that means they arrive only at such a degree of consideration as may dispose them to listen to more studied and elaborate discourses, I shall not think my Speculations useless. I might likewise observe, that the gloominess in which sometimes the minds of the best men are involved, very often stands in need of such little incitements to mirth and laughter, as are apt to disperse melancholy, and put our faculties in good humour. To which some will add, that the British climate, more than any other, makes entertainments of this nature in a manner necessary.

If what I have here said does not recommend, it will at least excuse the variety of my Speculations. I would not willingly laugh but in order to instruct, or if I sometimes fail in this point, when my mirth ceases to be instructive, it shall never cease to be innocent. A scrupulous conduct in this particular, has, perhaps, more merit in it than the generality of readers imagine; did they know how many thoughts occur in a point of humour, which a discreet Author in modesty suppresses: how many strokes of rally present themselves, which could not fail to please the ordinary taste of man-mankind, but are stifled in their birth by reason of some remote tendency which they carry in them to corrupt the minds of those who read them; did they know how many glances of ill-nature are industriously avoided for fear of doing injury to the reputation of another, they would be apt to think kindly of those writers who endeavour to make themselves diverting without being immoral. One may apply to these Authors that passage in Waller,

Poets lose half the praise they would have got,
Were it but known what they discreetly blot.

As nothing is more easy than to be a Wit, with all the above-mentioned Liberties, it requires some genius and invention to appear such without them.

What I have here said is not only in regard to the Public, but with an eye to my particular correspondent, who has sent me the following letter, which I have castrated in some places upon these considerations.

S I R,

‘ HAVING lately seen your discourse upon a ‘ match of Grinning, I cannot forbear ‘ giving you an account of a Whistling match,
 ‘ which, with many others, I was entertained ‘ with about three years since at the Bath.
 ‘ The prize was a Guinea, to be conferred upon ‘ the ablest Whistler, that is, on him who could ‘ whistle clearest, and go through his tune without

‘ without laughing, to which at the same time ‘ he was provoked by the antic postures of a ‘ Merry-Andrew, who was to stand upon the ‘ stage and play his tricks in the eye of the per‘ former. There were three competitors for the ‘ Guinea. The first was a plough-man of a very ‘ promising aspect; his features were steady,
‘ and his muscles composed in so inflexible a ‘ stupidity, that upon his first appearance every ‘ one gave the Guinea for lost. The pickled ‘ Herring however found the way to shake ‘ him; for upon his whistling a country jig, ‘ this unlucky wag danced to it with such va‘ riety of distortions and grimaces, that the coun‘ tryman could not forbear smiling upon him,
‘ and by that means spoiled his whistle, and lost
‘ the prize.

‘ The next that mounted the stage was an ‘ under-citizen of the Bath, a person remarkable ‘ among the inferior people of that place for ‘ his great wisdom and his broad band. He ‘ contracted his mouth with much gravity, and,
‘ that he might dispose his mind to be more ‘ serious than ordinary, begun the tune of The ‘ Children in the Wood, and went through part ‘ of it with good success; when on a sudden
‘ the Wit at his elbow, who had appeared won‘ derfully grave and attentive for some time, ‘ gave him a touch upon the left shoulder,
‘ and stared him in the face with so bewitch‘ ing a Grin, that the Whistler relaxed his ‘ fibres into a kind of simper, and at length ‘ burst out into an open laugh. The third ‘ who

' who entered the lists was a footman, who in
 ' defiance of the Merry-Andrew, and all his
 ' arts, whistled a Scotch tune and an Italian
 ' Sonata, with so settled a countenance, that he ' bore away the prize, to the great admiration
 ' of some hundreds of persons, who, as well as ' myself, were present at this trial of skill.
 ' Now, Sir, I humbly conceive, whatever you ' have determined of the Grinners, the Whistlers
 ' ought to be encouraged, not only as their art
 ' is practised without distortion, but as it im' proves country-music, promotes gravity, and
 ' teaches ordinary people to keep their coun' tenances, if they see any thing ridiculous in ' their betters; besides that it seems an enter' tainment very particularly adapted to the Bath,
 ' as it is usual for a rider to whistle to his horse
 ' when he would make his waters pass.

I am, Sir, &c.

POSTSCRIPT.

' After having dispatched these two important ' points of Grinning and Whistling, I hope you ' will oblige the world with some reflexions
 ' upon Yawning, as I have seen it practised
 ' on a twelfth-night among other Christmas gam-
 ' bols at the house of a very worthy Gentleman,
 ' who always entertains his tenants at that time
 ' of the year. They yawn for a Cheshire cheese,
 ' and begin about midnight, when the whole
 ' company is disposed to be drowsy. He that
 ' yawns widest, and at the same time so nat' urally

‘ naturally as to produce the most Yawns among ‘ the spectators, carries home the cheese. If you ‘ handle this subject as you ought, I question not ‘ but your Paper will set half the kingdom a Yawning, though I dare promise you it will never make any body fall asleep. L

N^o 180 Wednesday, September 26.

— Delirant reges, plestuntur Achivi.

Hor. Ep. 2. l. i. v. 14.

The People suffer when the Prince offends.

CREECH.

THE following Letter has so much weight and good sense, that I cannot forbear inserting it, though it relates to an hardened sinner, whom I have very little hopes of reforming, viz. Lewis the Fourteenth of France.

MR. SPECTATOR,

‘ A Midst the variety of subjects of which you ‘ have treated, I could wish it had fallen ‘ in your way, to expose the vanity of Conquests.
 ‘ This thought would naturally lead one to the ‘ French King, who has been generally esteemed
 ‘ the greatest conqueror of our age, until her ‘ Majesty’s armies had torn from him so many ‘ of his countries, and deprived him of the ‘ fruit of all his former victories. For my own ‘ part, if I were to draw his picture, I should be ‘ for

‘ for taking him no lower than the peace of Reswick, just at the end of his triumphs, and ‘ before his reverse of fortune; and even then ‘ I should not forbear thinking his ambition ‘ had been vain and unprofitable to himself and ‘ his people.

‘ As for himself, it is certain he can have ‘ gained nothing by his conquests, if they ‘ have not rendered him master of more subjects, more riches, or greater power. What ‘ I shall be able to offer upon these heads, I ‘ resolve to submit to your consideration.

‘ To begin then with his increase of subjects.
‘ From the time he came of age, and has been ‘ a manager for himself, all the people he had ‘ acquired were such only as he had reduced ‘ by his wars, and were left in his possession ‘ by the peace; he had conquered not above ‘ one third part of Flanders, and consequently ‘ no more than one third part of the inhabitants ‘ of that province.

‘ About an hundred years ago the houses in ‘ that country were all numbered, and by a ‘ just computation the inhabitants of all sorts ‘ could not then exceed seven hundred and fifty ‘ thousand souls. And if any man will consider the desolation by almost perpetual wars, ‘ the numerous armies that have lived almost ‘ ever since at discretion upon the people, and ‘ how much of their commerce has removed ‘ for more security to other places, he will have ‘ little reason to imagine that their numbers ‘ have since increased; and therefore with one ‘ third

‘ third part of that province that Prince can have ‘ gained no more than one third part of the in‘ habitants, or two hundred and fifty thousand ‘ new subjects, even though it should be sup‘ posed they were all contented to live still in ‘ their native country, and transfer their alle‘ giance to a new master.

‘ The fertility of this province, its convenient ‘ situation for trade and commerce, its capacity ‘ for furnishing employment and subsistence to ‘ great numbers, and the vast armies that have ‘ been maintained here, make it credible that the ‘ remaining two thirds of Flanders are equal to ‘ all his other conquests; and consequently by ‘ all he cannot have gained more than seven ‘ hundred and fifty thousand new subjects, ‘ men, women and children, especially if a ‘ deduction shall be made of such as have re‘ tired from the conqueror to live under their ‘ old masters.

‘ It is time now to set his loss against his ‘ profit, and to shew for the new subjects he ‘ had acquired, how many old ones he had ‘ lost in the acquisition: I think that in his ‘ wars he has seldom brought less into the field ‘ in all places than two hundred thousand fighting ‘ men, besides what have been left in garrisons;
‘ and I think the common computation is,
‘ that of an army, at the end of a campaign, ‘ without sieges or battles, scarce four fifths can ‘ be mustered of those that came into the field ‘ at the beginning of the year. His wars at ‘ several times until the last peace have held

‘ about twenty years ; and if forty thousand ‘ yearly lost, or a fifth part of his armies, are ‘ to be multiplied by twenty, he cannot have ‘ lost less than eight hundred thousand of his ‘ old subjects, and all able-bodied men ; a greater ‘ number than the new subjects he had acquired.

‘ But this loss is not all : Providence seems to ‘ have equally divided the whole mass of man‘ kind into different Sexes, that every woman ‘ may have her husband, and that both may ‘ equally contribute to the continuance of the ‘ species. It follows then, that for all the men ‘ that have been lost, as many women must ‘ have lived single, and it were but charity to ‘ believe they have not done all the service they ‘ were capable of doing in their generation.
‘ In so long a course of years great part of them ‘ must have died, and all the rest must go off ‘ at last without leaving any representatives be‘ hind. By this account he must have lost not ‘ only eight hundred thousand subjects, but ‘ double that number, and all the increase that ‘ was reasonably to be expected from it.

‘ It is said in the last war there was a famine ‘ in his kingdom, which swept away two mil‘ lions of his people. This is hardly credible :
‘ If the loss was only of one fifth part of that ‘ sum, it was very great. But it is no wonder ‘ there should be famine, where so much of ‘ the people’s substance is taken away for the ‘ King’s use, that they have not sufficient left ‘ to provide against accidents ; where so many ‘ of the men are taken from the plough to ‘ serve

‘ serve the King in his wars, and a great part ‘ of the tillage is left to the weaker hands of ‘ so many women and children. Whatever was ‘ the loss, it must undoubtedly be placed to the ‘ account of his ambition.

‘ And so must also the destruction or banish‘ ment of three or four hundred thousand of ‘ his reformed subjects; he could have no other ‘ reasons for valuing those lives so very cheap, ‘ but only to recommend himself to the bigotry
 ‘ of the Spanish nation.

‘ How should there be industry in a coun‘ try where all property is precarious? What ‘ Subject will sow his land that his Prince may ‘ reap the whole harvest? Parsimony and fru‘ gality must be strangers to such a people; for ‘ will any man save to-day what he has reason ‘ to fear will be taken from him to-morrow?
 ‘ And where is the encouragement for marrying?
 ‘ Will any man think of raising children, with‘ out any assurance of clothing for their backs, ‘ or so much as food for their bellies? And ‘ thus by his fatal ambition he must have ‘ lessened the number of his subjects not only by ‘ slaughter and destruction, but by preventing ‘ their very births, he has done as much as ‘ was possible towards destroying posterity itself.

‘ Is this then the great, the invincible Lewis?
 ‘ This the immortal man, the tout-puissant, or ‘ the Almighty, as his flatterers have called him?
 ‘ Is this the man that is so celebrated for his ‘ conquests? For every subject he has acquired, ‘ has he not lost three that were his inheritance?

‘ Are not his troops fewer, and those neither ‘ so well fed, or clothed, or paid, as they were ‘ formerly, though he has now so much greater ‘ cause to exert himself? And what can be the ‘ reason of all this, but that his revenue is a ‘ great deal less, his subjects are either poorer, ‘ or not so many to be plundered by constant ‘ taxes for his use?

‘ It is well for him he had found out a way ‘ to steal a kingdom; if he had gone on con‘ quering as he did before, his ruin had been ‘ long since finished. This brings to my mind
‘ a saying of King Pyrrhus, after he had a second ‘ time beat the Romans in a pitched battle, and ‘ was complimented by his Generals; “ Yes, “ says he, such another victory and I am quite “ undone ” And since I have mentioned Pyrrhus, ‘ I will end with a very good, though ‘ known story of this ambitious mad man.
‘ When he had shewn the utmost fondness for ‘ his expedition against the Romans, Cyneas his ‘ chief Minister asked him what he proposed to ‘ himself by this war? Why, says Pyrrhus, to con‘ quer the Romans, and reduce all Italy to my ‘ obedience. What then? says Cyneas. To pass ‘ over into Sicily, says Pyrrhus, and then all ‘ the Sicilians must be our subjects. And what ‘ does your Majesty intend next? Why truly, ‘ says the King, to conquer Carthage, and make ‘ myself master of all Africa. And what, Sir, ‘ says the Minister, is to be the end of all your ‘ expeditions? Why then, says the King, for ‘ the rest of our lives we will sit down to ‘ good

‘ good wine. How, Sir, replied Cyneas, to ‘ better than we have now before us? Have we ‘ not already as much as we can drink?

‘ Riot and Excess are not the becoming cha‘ racters of Princes; but if Pyrrhus and Lewis ‘ had debauched like Vitellius, they had been ‘ less hurtful to their people.

T Your humble servant,
Philarithmus.

N^o 181 Thursday, September 27.

His lacrymis vitam damus, & misereſcimus ultro.
 Virg. Æn. 2. v. 145.

Mov'd by theſe Tears, we pity and protect.

I Am more pleaſed with a letter that is filled with touches of nature than of wit. The following one is of this kind.

S I R,

‘ A MONG all the diſtreſſes which hap‘ pen in families, I do not remember ‘ that you have touched upon the marriage of ‘ Children without the conſent of their parents.
 ‘ I am one of theſe unfortunate perſons. I was ‘ about fifteen when I took the Liberty to chooſe ‘ for myſelf; and have ever ſince languished
 ‘ under the diſpleaſure of an inexorable Father, ‘ who, though he ſees me happy in the beſt of F 3 husbands,

‘ husbands, and blessed with very fine children,
‘ can never be prevailed upon to forgive me.
‘ He was so kind to me before this unhappy ‘ accident, that indeed it makes my breach of ‘ duty, in some measure, inexcusable; and at ‘ the same time creates in me such a tenderness ‘ towards him, that I love him above all things, ‘ and would die to be reconciled to him. I have ‘ thrown myself at his feet, and besought him ‘ with tears to pardon me; but he always pushes ‘ me away, and spurns me from him; I have ‘ written several letters to him, but he will nei‘ ther open nor receive them. About two years ‘ ago I sent my little boy to him, dressed in a ‘ new apparel; but the child returned to me ‘ crying, because he said his grandfather would ‘ not see him, and had ordered him to be put out ‘ of his house. My mother is won over to my ‘ side, but dares not mention me to my father ‘ for fear of provoking him. About a month ‘ ago he lay sick upon his bed, and in great ‘ danger of his life: I was pierced to the heart ‘ at the news, and could not forbear going to ‘ inquire after his health. My mother took this ‘ opportunity of speaking in my behalf: She ‘ told him with abundance of tears, that I was ‘ come to see him, that I could not speak to ‘ her for weeping, and that I should certainly ‘ break my heart if he refused at that time to ‘ give me his blessing, and be reconciled to me.
‘ He was so far from relenting towards me, ‘ that he bid her speak no more of me, unless ‘ she had a mind to disturb him in his last mo‘ ments;

'ments; for, Sir, you must know that he has
'the reputation of an honest and religious man,
'which makes my misfortune so much the 'greater. God be thanked, he is since reco'vered: But his severe usage has given me such 'a blow, that I shall soon sink under it, unless
'I may be relieved by any impressions which
'the reading of this in your Paper may make 'upon him.

I am, &c.

Of all hardnecesses of heart there is none so inexcusable as that of Parents towards their Children. An obstinate, inflexible, unforgiving temper is odious upon all occasions; but here it is unnatural. The love, tenderness, and compassion, which are apt to arise in us towards those who depend upon us, is that by which the whole world of Life is upheld. The supreme Being, by the transcendent excellency and goodness of his nature, extends his Mercy towards all his works; and because his creatures have not such a spontaneous benevolence and compassion towards those who are under their care and protection, he has implanted in them an instinct, that supplies the place of this inherent goodness. I have illustrated this kind of Instinct in former Papers, and have shewn how it runs through all the species of brute Creatures, as indeed the whole animal creation subsists by it.

This instinct in man is more general and uncircumscribed than in brutes, as being enlarged by the dictates of reason and duty. For if we consider ourselves attentively, we shall find that we are not only inclined to love those who descend from us, but that we bear a kind of σφγνῆ, or natural affection, to every thing which relies upon us for its good and preservation. Dependence is a perpetual call upon humanity, and a greater incitement to tenderness and pity than any other motive whatsoever.

The man therefore who, notwithstanding any passion or resentment, can overcome this powerful instinct, and extinguish natural affection, debases his mind even below brutality, frustrates, as much as in him lies, the great design of Providence, and strikes out of his nature one of the most divine Principles that is planted in it.

Among innumerable arguments which might be brought against such an unreasonable proceeding, I shall only insist on one. We make it the condition of our forgiveness that we forgive others. In our very prayers we desire no more than to be treated by this kind of retaliation. The case therefore before us seems to be what they call a case in point; the relation between the child and father being what comes nearest to that between a Creature and its Creator. If the father is inexorable to the child who has offended, let the offence be of never so high a nature, how will he address himself to the supreme Being, under the tender appellation of a father, and desire of him such a forgiveness as he himself refuses to grant?

To this I might add many other religious, as well as many prudential considerations; but if the last mentioned motive does not prevail, I despair of succeeding by any other, and shall therefore conclude my Paper with a very remarkable story, which is recorded in an old chronicle published by Freber, among the writers of the German history.

Eginhart, who was Secretary to Charles the Great, became exceeding popular by his behaviour in that post. His great abilities gained him the favour of his master, and the esteem of the whole Court. Imma, the daughter of the Emperor, was so pleased with his person and conversation, that she fell in love with him. As she was one of the greatest Beauties of the age, Eginhart answered her with a more than equal return of passion. They stifled their flames for some time, under apprehension of the fatal consequences that might ensue. Eginhart at length resolving to hazard all, rather than be deprived of one whom his heart was so much set upon, conveyed himself one night into the princess's apartment, and knocking gently at the door, was admitted as a person who had something to communicate to her from the Emperor. He was with her in private most part of the night; but upon his preparing to go away about break of day, he observed that there had fallen a great snow during his stay with the princess. This very much perplexed him, lest the prints of his feet in the snow might make discoveries to the King, who often used to visit his daughter in the morning.

morning. He acquainted the princess Imma with his fears; who, after some consultations upon the matter, prevailed upon him to let her carry him through the snow upon her own shoulders. It happened, that the Emperor not being able to sleep, was at that time up and walking in his chamber, when upon looking through the window he perceived his daughter tottering under her burden, and carrying his first Minister across the snow; which she had no sooner done, but she returned again with the utmost speed to her own apartment. The Emperor was extremely troubled and astonished at this accident; but resolved to speak nothing of it until a proper opportunity. In the mean time, Eginbart knowing that what he had done could not be long a secret, determined to retire from Court; and in order to it begged the Emperor that he would be pleased to dismiss him, pretending a kind of discontent at his not having been rewarded for his long services. The Emperor would not give a direct answer to his petition, but told him he would think of it, and appointed a certain day when he would let him know his pleasure. He then called together the most faithful of his counsellors, and acquainting them with his Secretary's crime, asked them their advice in so delicate an affair. They most of them gave their opinion that the person could not be too severely punished who had thus dishonoured his master. Upon the whole debate, the Emperor declared it was his opinion, that Eginbart's punishment would rather increase than than diminish the shame of his family, and that therefore he thought it the most advisable to wear out the memory of the fact, by marrying him to his daughter. Accordingly Eginbart was called in, and acquainted by the Emperor, that he should no longer have any pretence of complaining his services were not rewarded, for that the Princess Imma should be given him in marriage, with a dower suitable to her Quality; which was soon after performed accordingly. L

N^o 182 Friday, September 28.

Plus aloës quàm mellis habet——

Juv. Sat. 6. v. 180.

The bitter overbalances the sweet.

AS all parts of human life come under my observation, my reader must not make uncharitable inferences from my speaking knowingly of that sort of crime which is at present treated of. He will, I hope, suppose I know it only from the letters of correspondents, two of which you shall have as follow.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

‘ IT is wonderful to me that among the many ‘ enormities which you have treated of, you ‘ have not mentioned that of Wenching, and ‘ particularly the insnaring part; I mean, that ‘ it

‘ it is a thing very fit for your pen, to expose ‘ the villany of the practice of deluding women.
‘ You are to know, Sir, that I myself am a woman ‘ who have been one of the unhappy that ‘ have fallen into this misfortune, and that by ‘ the insinuation of a very worthless fellow, who ‘ served others in the same manner both before ‘ my ruin and since that time. I had, as soon ‘ as the rascal left me, so much indignation and ‘ resolution, as not to go upon the town, as the ‘ phrase is, but took to work for my living in ‘ an obscure place, out of the knowledge of all ‘ with whom I was before acquainted.

‘ It is the ordinary practice and business of ‘ life with a set of idle fellows about this town,
‘ to write letters, send messages, and form ap‘ pointments with little raw unthinking girls, ‘ and leave them after possession of them, with‘ out any mercy, to shame, infamy, poverty,
‘ and disease. Were you to read the nauseous ‘ impertinences which are written on these oc‘ casions, and to see the silly creatures sighing ‘ over them, it could not but be matter of mirth
‘ as well as pity. A little prentice girl of mine ‘ has been for some time applied to by an Irish ‘ fellow, who dresses very fine, and struts in a ‘ laced coat, and is the admiration of seamstresses ‘ who are under age in town. Ever since I have ‘ had some knowledge of the matter, I have ‘ debarred my prentice from pen, ink and ‘ paper. But the other day he bespoke some ‘ cravats of me: I went out of the shop, and ‘ left his mistress to put them up into a band-box
‘ in

‘ in order to be sent to him when his man called.
‘ When I came into the shop again, I took occasion to send her away, and found in the bottom of the box written these words, “ Why would you ruin a harmless creature that loves you ?” then in the lid, “ There is no resisting Strephon :” I searched a little farther, and found in the rim of the box, “ At eleven of the clock at night come in an hackney-coach at the end of our street.” This was enough to alarm me ; I sent away the things, and took my measures accordingly. An hour or two before the appointed time I examined my young Lady, and found her trunk stuffed with impertinent letters, and an old scroll of parchment in Latin, which her Lover had sent her as a settlement of fifty pounds a year : Among other things, there was also the best lace I had in my shop to make him a present for cravats. I was very glad of this last circumstance, because I could very conscientiously swear against him that he had enticed my servant away, and was her accomplice in robbing me : I procured a warrant against him accordingly. Every thing was now prepared, and the tender hour of love approaching, I, who had acted for myself in my youth the same senseless part, knew how to manage accordingly : Therefore, after having locked up my maid, and not being so much unlike her in height and shape, as in a huddled way not to pass for her, I delivered the bundle designed to be carried off to her Lover’s ‘ man,

‘ man, who came with the signal to receive ‘ them. Thus I followed after to the coach, ‘ where when I saw his master take them in,
‘ I cried out, thieves! thieves! and the Con‘ stable with his attendants seized my expecting ‘ Lover. I kept myself unobserved until I ‘ saw the crowd sufficiently increased, and then ‘ appeared to declare the goods to be mine;
‘ and had the satisfaction to see my man of ‘ mode put into the Round-house, with the stolen ‘ wares by him, to be produced in evidence against ‘ him the next morning. This matter is noto‘ riously known to be fact; and I have been ‘ contented to save my ’prentice, and take a year’s ‘ rent of this mortified Lover, not to appear ‘ farther in the matter. This was some penance;
‘ but, Sir, is this enough for a villany of much ‘ more pernicious consequence than the trifles ‘ for which he was to have been indicted?
‘ Should not you, and all men of any parts ‘ or honour, put things upon so right a foot, ‘ as that such a rascal should not laugh at the ‘ imputation of what he was really guilty, and ‘ dread being accused of that for which he was ‘ arrested?

‘ In a word, Sir, it is in the power of you,
‘ and such as I hope you are, to make it as ‘ infamous to rob a poor creature of her ‘ honour as her clothes. I leave this to your ‘ consideration, only take leave (which I cannot ‘ do without sighing) to remark to you, that ‘ if this had been the sense of mankind thirty ‘ years

' years ago, I should have avoided a life spent
' in poverty and shame.

I am, Sir,

Your most humble servant,

Alice Threadneedle.

Mr. SPECTATOR, Round-houfe, Sept. 9.

' I Am a man of pleasure about town, but
' by the stupidity of a dull rogue of a Justice
' of Peace, and an insolent Constable, upon the ' oath of an old Harridan, am imprisoned here
' for theft, when I designed only fornication.
' The midnight Magistrate, as he conveyed me
' along, had you in his mouth, and said, this
' would make a pure story for the SPECTATOR.
' I hope, Sir, you will not pretend to wit, and ' take the part of dull rogues of business. The ' world is so altered of late years, that there ' was not a man who would knock down a
' watchman in my behalf, but I was carried ' off with as much triumph-as if I had been a ' pick-pocket. At this rate, there is an end of ' all the wit and humour in the world. The ' time was when all the honest whore-masters
' in the neighbourhood would have rose against ' the cuckolds to my rescue. If fornication is ' to be scandalous, half the fine things that ' have been writ by most of the Wits of the ' last age may be burnt by the common ' hangman. Harkee, Mr. S P E C, do not be ' queer; after having done some things pretty
' well,

‘ well, do not begin to write at that rate that no ‘ Gentleman can read thee. Be true to Love,
 ‘ and burn your Seneca. You do not expect me ‘ to write my name from hence, but I am

Your unknown humble, &c.

N^o 183 Saturday, September 29.

Ἰδμεν ψεύδεα πολλὰ λέγειν ἐτύμοισιν ὁμοῖα,

Ἰδμεν δ' εὖτ' ἐθέλομεν, ἀληθεία μυθήσασθαι.

Hesiod.

Sometimes fair truth in fiction we disguise,
 Sometimes present her naked to men's eyes.

FABLES were the first pieces of wit that made their appearance in the world, and have been still highly valued not only in times of the greatest simplicity, but among the most polite ages of mankind. Jotham's Fable of the trees is the oldest that is extant, and as beautiful as any which have been made since that time. Nathan's Fable of the poor man and his lamb is likewise more ancient than any that is extant, besides the above-mentioned, and had so good an effect, as to convey instruction to the ear of a King without offending it, and to bring the man after God's own heart to a right sense of his guilt and his duty. We find Æsop in the most distant ages of Greece; and if we look into the very beginning of the commonwealth of Rome, we see a mutiny among the common people appeared

peased by a Fable of the Belly and the Limbs, which was indeed very proper to gain the attention of an incensed rabble, at a time when perhaps they would have torn to pieces any man who had preached the same doctrine to them in an open and direct manner. As Fables took their birth in the very infancy of learning, they never flourished more than when learning was at its greatest height. To justify this assertion, I shall put my reader in mind of Horace, the greatest wit and critic in the Augustan age; and of Boileau, the most correct poet among the moderns: Not to mention La Fontaine, who by this way of writing is come more into vogue than any other author of our times.

The Fables I have here mentioned are raised altogether upon brutes and vegetables, with some of our own species mixt among them, when the moral hath so required. But besides this kind of Fable, there is another in which the actors are passions, virtues, vices, and other imaginary persons of the like nature. Some of the ancient critics will have it, that the Iliad and Odyssey of Homer are Fables of this nature; and that the several names of Gods and Heroes are nothing else but the affections of the mind in a visible shape and character. Thus they tell us, that Achilles in the first Iliad, represents Anger, or the irascible part of human nature; that upon drawing his sword against his superior in a full assembly, Pallas is only another name for Reason, which checks and advises him upon that occasion; and at her first appearance touches him upon the head, that part of the man being looked upon as the seat of Reason. And thus of the rest of the Poem. As for the Odyſſey, I think it is plain that Horace conſidered it as one of theſe allegorical Fables, by the moral which he has given us of ſeveral parts of it. The greateſt Italian wits have applied themſelves to the writing of this latter kind of Fables: As Spencer's Fairy-Queen is one continued ſeries of them from the beginning to the end of that admirable work. If we look into the fineſt Proſe-authors of antiquity, ſuch as Cicero, Plato, Xenophon, and many others, we ſhall find that this was likewiſe their favourite kind of Fable. I ſhall only farther obſerve upon it, that the firſt of this ſort that made any conſiderable figure in the world, was that of Hercules meeting with Pleaſure and Virtue; which was invented by Prodicus, who lived before Socrates, and in the firſt dawns of philoſophy. He uſed to travel through Greece by virtue of this Fable, which procured him a kind reception in all the market-towns, where he never failed telling it as ſoon as he had gathered an audience about him.

After this ſhort preface, which I have made up of ſuch materials as my memory does at preſent ſuggeſt to me, before I preſent my reader with a Fable of this kind, which I deſign as the entertainment of the preſent Paper, I muſt in a few words open the occaſion of it.

In the account which Plato gives us of the converſation and behaviour of Socrates the morning ing he was to die, he tells the following circumstance.

When Socrates his fetters were knocked off (as was usual to be done on the day that the condemned person was to be executed) being seated in the midst of his disciples, and laying one of his legs over the other, in a very unconcerned posture, he began to rub it where it had been galled by the iron; and whether it was to shew the indifference with which he entertained the thoughts of his approaching death, or (after his usual manner) to take every occasion of philosophizing upon some useful subject, he observed the pleasure of that sensation which now arose in those very parts of his leg, that just before had been so much pained by the fetter. Upon this he reflected on the nature of pleasure and pain in general, and how constantly they succeed one another. To this he added, that if a man of a good genius for a Fable were to represent the nature of pleasure and pain in that way of writing, he would probably join them together after such a manner, that it would be impossible for the one to come into any place without being followed by the other.

It is possible, that if Plato had thought it proper at such a time to describe Socrates launching out into a discourse which was not of a-piece with the business of the day, he would have enlarged upon this hint, and have drawn it out into some beautiful Allegory or Fable. But since he has not done it, I shall attempt to write one myself in the spirit of that divine author.

‘ There were two families which from the beginning of the world were as opposite to each other as light and darkness. The one of them lived in Heaven, and the other in Hell. The youngest descendant of the first family was Pleasure, who was the daughter of Happiness, who was the child of Virtue, who was the offspring of the Gods. These, as I said before, had their habitation in Heaven. The youngest of the opposite family was Pain, who was the son of Misery, who was the child of Vice, who was the offspring of the Furies. The habitation of this race of Beings was in Hell.

‘ The middle station of nature between these two opposite extremes was the Earth, which was inhabited by creatures of a middle kind, neither so virtuous as the one, nor so vicious as the other, but partaking of the good and bad qualities of these two opposite families. Jupiter considering that this species, commonly called man, was too virtuous to be miserable, and too vicious to be happy; that he might make a distinction between the good and the bad, ordered the two youngest of the above-mentioned families, Pleasure who was the daughter of Happiness, and Pain who was the son of Misery, to meet one another upon this part of nature which lay in the half-way between them, having promised to settle it upon them both, provided they could agree upon the division of it, so as to share mankind between them.

‘ Pleasure

‘ Pleasure and Pain were no sooner met in ‘ their new habitation, but they immediately ‘ agreed upon this point, that Pleasure should ‘ take possession of the virtuous, and Pain of the ‘ vicious part of that species which was given ‘ up to them. But upon examining to which ‘ of them any individual they met with be‘ longed, they found each of them had a right ‘ to him; for that, contrary to what they had ‘ seen, in their old places of residence, there ‘ was no person so vicious who had not some ‘ good in him, nor any person so virtuous who ‘ had not in him some evil. The truth of it is, ‘ they generally found upon search, that in the ‘ most vicious man Pleasure might lay a claim ‘ to an hundredth part, and that in the most ‘ virtuous man pain might come in for at least ‘ two thirds. This they saw would occasion end‘ less disputes between them, unless they could ‘ come to some accommodation. To this end ‘ there was a marriage proposed between them,
‘ and at length concluded: By this means it is ‘ that we find Pleasure and Pain are such con‘ stant yoke-fellows, and that they either make ‘ their visits together, or are never far asunder.
‘ If Pain comes into an heart, he is quickly ‘ followed by Pleasure; and if Pleasure enters, ‘ you may be sure Pain is not far off.

‘ But notwithstanding this marriage was very ‘ convenient for the two parties, it did not seem ‘ to answer the intention of Jupiter in sending ‘ them among mankind. To remedy therefore ‘ this inconvenience, it was stipulated between ‘ them by article, and confirmed by the consent of each family, that notwithstanding they here possessed the species indifferently ; upon the death of every single person, if he was found to have in him a certain proportion of evil, he should be dispatched into the infernal regions by a passport from Pain, there to dwell with Misery, Vice, and the Furies. Or on the contrary, if he had in him a certain proportion of good, he should be dispatched into Heaven by a passport from Pleasure, there to dwell with Happiness, Virtue, and the Gods.’ L

N^o 184 Monday, October 1.

—Opere in longo fas est obrepere somnum.

Hor. Ars Poet. v. 360.

—In long works sleep will sometimes surpise.

R O S C O M M O N.

WHEN a man has discovered a new vein of humour, it often carries him much farther than he expected from it. My correspondents take the hint I give them, and pursue it into speculations which I never thought of at my first starting it. This has been the fate of my paper on the match of Grinning, which has already produced a second paper on parallel subjects, and brought me the following Letter by the last post. I shall not premise any thing to it it farther, than that it is built on matter of fact, and is as follows.

S I R,

‘ YOU have already obliged the world with ‘ a discourse upon Grinning, and have since ‘ proceeded to Whistling, from whence you at ‘ length came to Yawning; from this, I think, ‘ you may make a very natural transition to ‘ Sleeping. I therefore recommend to you for the ‘ subject of a Paper the following advertisement, ‘ which about two months ago was given into ‘ every body’s hands, and may be seen with ‘ some additions in the Daily Courant of August ‘ the ninth.

“ Nicholas Hart, who slept last year in St.
 “ Bartholomew’s Hospital, intends to sleep this “ year at the Cock and Bottle in Little-Britain.”

‘ Having since inquired into the matter of fact, ‘ I find that the above-mentioned Nicholas Hart ‘ is every year seized with a periodical fit of ‘ Sleeping, which begins upon the fifth of August, ‘ and ends on the eleventh of the same month :
 ‘ That

‘ On the first of that month he grew dull ;
 ‘ On the second, appeared drowsy ;
 ‘ On the third, fell a yawning ;
 ‘ On the fourth, began to nod ;
 ‘ On the fifth, dropped asleep ;
 ‘ On the sixth, was heard to snore ;

- ‘ On the seventh, turned himself in his bed ;
- ‘ On the eighth, recovered his former posture ;
- ‘ On the ninth, fell a stretching ;
- ‘ On the tenth about midnight, awaked ;
- ‘ On the eleventh in the morning, called for
- ‘ a little small-beer.

‘ This account I have extracted out of the ‘ journal of this sleeping worthy, as it has been ‘ faithfully kept by a Gentleman of Lincoln’s-Inn, ‘ who has undertaken to be his Historiographer.
 ‘ I have sent it to you, not only as it represents ‘ the actions of Nicholas Hart, but as it seems ‘ a very natural picture of the life of many an ‘ honest English Gentleman, whose whole history ‘ very often consists of yawning, nodding, stretch‘ ing, turning, sleeping, drinking, and the like ‘ extraordinary particulars. I do not question, ‘ Sir, that, if you pleased, you could put out ‘ an advertisement not unlike the above-men‘ tioned, of several men of figure ; that Mr.
 ‘ John such-a-one, Gentleman, or Thomas such-‘ a-one, Esquire, who slept in the country last ‘ summer, intends to sleep in town this winter.
 ‘ The worst of it is, that the drowsy part of ‘ our species is chiefly made up of very honest ‘ Gentlemen, who live quietly among their ‘ neighbours, without ever disturbing the public ‘ peace : They are drones without stings. I ‘ could heartily wish, that several turbulent, rest‘ less, ambitious spirits, would for a-while ‘ change places with these good men, and enter ‘ themselves into Nicholas Hart’s fraternity.

Could

‘ Could one but lay asleep a few busy heads ‘ which I could name, from the first of November ‘ next to the first of May ensuing, I ‘ question not but it would very much redound ‘ to the quiet of particular persons, as well as ‘ to the benefit of the Public.

‘ But to return to Nicholas Hart : I believe, ‘ Sir, you will think it a very extraordinary circumstance for a man to gain his livelihood
‘ by Sleeping, and that rest should procure a ‘ man sustenance as well as industry ; yet so it ‘ is that Nicholas got last year enough to support ‘ himself for a twelvemonth. I am likewise informed that he has this year had a very comfortable nap. The Poets value themselves very ‘ much for sleeping on Parnassus, but I never ‘ heard they got a groat by it : On the contrary, our friend Nicholas gets more by Sleeping than he could by Working, and may be ‘ more properly said, than ever Homer was, to ‘ have had golden dreams. Juvenal indeed ‘ mentions a drowsy husband who raised an ‘ estate by snoring, but then he is represented ‘ to have slept what the common people call ‘ a dog’s Sleep ; or if his Sleep was real, his wife ‘ was awake, and about her business. Your ‘ pen, which loves to moralize upon all subjects, ‘ may raise something, methinks, on this circumstance also, and point out to us those sets ‘ of men, who instead of growing rich by an ‘ honest industry, recommend themselves to the ‘ favours of the Great, by making themselves agreeable

‘ agreeable companions in the participations of ‘ luxury and pleasure.

‘ I must further acquaint you, Sir, that one ‘ of the most eminent pens in Grubstreet is now ‘ employed in writing the dream of this mira‘ culous Sleeper, which I hear will be of a ‘ more than ordinary length, as it must con‘ tain all the particulars that are supposed to ‘ have passed in his imagination during so long ‘ a Sleep. He is said to have gone already ‘ through three days and three nights of it,
‘ and to have comprised in them the most re‘ markable passages of the four first empires
‘ of the world. If he can keep free from party-‘ strokes, his work may be of use; but this I ‘ much doubt, having been informed by one of ‘ his friends and confidants, that he has spoken ‘ some things of Nimrod with too great free‘ dom.

L

I am ever, Sir, &c.

Tuesday,

N° 185 Tuesday, October 2.

—Tantæne animis cœlestibus iræ?

Virg. Æn. I. v. 15.

And dwells such fury in cœlestial breasts?

THERE is nothing in which men more deceive themselves than in what the world call Zeal. There are so many passions which hide themselves under it, and so many mischiefs arising from it, that some have gone so far as to say it would have been for the benefit of mankind if it had never been reckoned in the catalogue of virtues. It is certain, where it is once laudable and prudential, it is an hundred times criminal and erroneous; nor can it be otherwise, if we consider that it operates with equal violence in all religions, however opposite they may be to one another, and in all the subdivisions of each religion in particular.

We are told by some of the Jewish Rabbins, that the first murder was occasioned by a religious controversy; and if we had the whole history of Zeal from the days of Cain to our own times, we should see it filled with so many scenes of slaughter and bloodshed, as would make a wise man very careful how he suffers himself to be actuated by such a principle, when it only regards matters of opinion and speculation.

I would have every zealous man examine his heart thoroughly, and, I believe, he will often find, that what he calls a Zeal for his religion, is either pride, interest, or ill-nature. A man, who differs from another in opinion, sets himself above him in his own judgment, and in several particulars pretends to be the wiser person. This is a great provocation to the proud man, and gives a very keen edge to what he calls his Zeal. And that this is the case very often, we may observe from the behaviour of some of the most zealous for orthodoxy, who have often great friendships and intimacies with vicious immoral men, provided they do but agree with them in the same scheme of belief. The reason is, because the vicious Believer gives the precedency to the virtuous man, and allows the good christian to be the worthier person, at the same time that he cannot come up to his perfections. This we find exemplified in that trite passage which we see quoted in almost every system of Ethics, though upon another occasion.

—Vide meliora proboque,

Deteriora sequor—

Ovid. Met. l. 7. v. 20.

I see the right, and I approve it too;

Condemn the wrong, and yet the wrong pursue.

T A T E.

On the contrary, it is certain, if our Zeal were true and genuine, we should be much more angry with a sinner than a heretic; since there are several cases which may excuse the latter before before his great Judge, but none which can excuse the former.

Interest is likewise a great inflamer, and sets a man on persecution under the colour of Zeal. For this reason we find none are so forward to promote the true worship by fire and sword, as those who find their present account in it. But I shall extend the word Interest to a larger meaning than what is generally given it, as it relates to our spiritual safety and welfare, as well as to our temporal. A man is glad to gain numbers on his side, as they serve to strengthen him in his private opinions. Every proselyte is like a new argument for the establishment of his faith. It makes him believe that his principles carry conviction with them, and are the more likely to be true, when he finds they are conformable to the reason of others, as well as to his own. And that this temper of mind deludes a man very often into an opinion of his Zeal, may appear from the common behaviour of the atheist, who maintains and spreads his opinions with as much heat as those who believe they do it only out of a passion for God's glory.

Ill-nature is another dreadful imitator of Zeal. Many a good man may have a natural rancour and malice in his heart, which has been in some measure quelled and subdued by religion; but if it finds any pretence of breaking out, which does not seem to him inconsistent with the duties of a christian, it throws off all restraint, and rages in its full fury. Zeal is therefore a great ease to a malicious man, by making him believe he does

God service, whilst he is gratifying the bent of a perverse revengeful temper. For this reason we find, that most of the massacres and devastations, which have been in the world, have taken their rise from a furious pretended Zeal.

I love to see a man zealous in a good matter, and especially when his Zeal shews itself for advancing morality, and promoting the happiness of mankind: But when I find the instruments he works with are racks and gibbets, gallies and dungeons; when he imprisons mens persons, confiscates their estates, ruins their families, and burns the body to save the soul, I cannot stick to pronounce of such a one, that (whatever he may think of his faith and religion) his faith is vain, and his religion unprofitable.

After having treated of these false Zealots in religion, I cannot forbear mentioning a monstrous species of men, who one would not think had any existence in nature, were they not to be met with in ordinary conversation, I mean the Zealots in atheism. One would fancy that these men, though they fall short, in every other respect, of those who make a profession of religion, would at least outshine them in this particular, and be exempt from that single fault which seems to grow out of the imprudent fervours of religion: But so it is, that infidelity is propagated with as much fierceness and contention, wrath and indignation, as if the safety of mankind depended upon it. There is something so ridiculous and perverse in this kind of Zealots, that one does not know how to set them out in their proper colours.

colours. They are a sort of gamesters who are eternally upon the fret though they play for nothing. They are perpetually teizing their friends to come over to them, though at the same time they allow that neither of them shall get any thing by the bargain. In short, the Zeal of spreading atheism is, if possible, more absurd than atheism itself.

Since I have mentioned this unaccountable Zeal which appears in atheists and infidels, I must farther observe that they are likewise in a most particular manner possessed with the spirit of bigotry. They are wedded to opinions full of contradiction and impossibility, and at the same time look upon the smallest difficulty in an article of faith as a sufficient reason for rejecting it. Notions that fall in with the common reason of mankind, that are conformable to the sense of all ages and all nations, not to mention their tendency for promoting the happiness of societies, or of particular persons, are exploded as errors and prejudices; and schemes erected in their stead that are altogether monstrous and irrational, and require the most extravagant credulity to embrace them. I would fain ask one of these bigotted infidels, supposing all the great points of atheism, as the casual or eternal formation of the world, the materiality of a thinking substance, the mortality of the soul, the fortuitous organization of the body, the motions and gravitation of matter, with the like particulars, were laid together and formed into a kind of creed, according to the opinions of the most celebrated atheists;

atheists; I say, supposing such a creed as this were formed, and imposed upon any one people in the world, whether it would not require an infinitely greater measure of faith, than any set of articles which they so violently oppose. Let me therefore advise this generation of wranglers, for their own and for the public good, to act at least so consistently with themselves, as not to burn with Zeal for Irreligion, and with Bigotry for Nonsense. C

N^o 186 Wednesday, October 3.

Cælum ipsum petimus stultitiâ.——

Hör. Od. 3. l. 1. v. 38.

——Scarce the Gods, and heav'nly climes,
Are safe from our audacious crimes.

DRYDEN.

UPON my return to my lodgings last night I found a letter from my worthy friend the Clergyman, whom I have given some account of in my former Papers. He tells me in it that he was particularly pleased with the latter part of my yesterday's Speculation; and at the same time inclosed the following Essay, which he desires me to publish as the sequel of that discourse. It consists partly of uncommon reflexions, and partly of such as have been already used, but now set in a stronger light.

A

‘ A Believer may be excused by the most ‘ hardened Atheist for endeavouring to make ‘ him a convert, because he does it with an ‘ eye to both their interests. The Atheist is ‘ inexcusable who tries to gain over a Believer, ‘ because he does not propose the doing himself ‘ or the Believer any good by such a conversion.

‘ The prospect of a future state is the secret ‘ comfort and refreshment of my Soul; it is ‘ that which makes nature look gay about me;
‘ it doubles all my pleasures, and supports me ‘ under all my afflictions. I can look at dis‘ appointments and misfortunes, pain and sick‘ ness, death itself, and, what is worse than ‘ death, the loss of those who are dearest to ‘ me, with indifference, so long as I keep in view ‘ the pleasures of Eternity, and the state of ‘ Being in which there will be no fears nor ‘ apprehensions, pains nor sorrows, sickness nor ‘ separation. Why will any man be so im-‘ pertinently officious as to tell me all this is ‘ is only fancy and delusion? Is there any merit ‘ in being the messenger of ill news? If it is a ‘ dream, let me enjoy it, since it makes me both ‘ the happier and better man.

‘ I must confess I do not know how to trust
‘ a man who believes neither Heaven nor Hell,
‘ or, in other words, a future State of rewards
‘ and punishments. Not only natural self-love, ‘ but reason directs us to promote our own in‘ terest above all things. It can never be for ‘ the interest of a Believer to do me a mischief, ‘ because he is sure upon the balance of accompts

' to find himself a loser by it. On the con' trary, if he considers his own welfare in his ' behaviour towards me, it will lead him to do
 ' me all the good he can, and at the same ' time restrain him from doing me any injury.
 ' An Unbeliever does not act like a reasonable ' creature, if he favours me contrary to his pre' sent interest, or does not distress me when it ' turns to his present advantage. Honour and ' good-nature may indeed tie up his hands;
 ' but as these would be very much strengthened
 ' by reason and principle, so without them they ' are only instincts, or wavering unsettled notions,
 ' which rest on no foundation.

' Infidelity has been attacked with so good ' success of late years, that it is driven out of ' all its outworks. The Atheist has not found ' his post tenable, and is therefore retired into
 ' Deism, and a disbelief of revealed religion only.
 ' But the truth of it is, the greatest number of ' this set of men, are those who, for want of
 ' a virtuous education, or examining the grounds
 ' of religion, know so very little of the matter
 ' in question, that their infidelity is but another ' term for their ignorance.

' As folly and inconsiderateness are the foun' dations of infidelity, the great pillars and sup' ports of it are either a vanity of appearing wiser
 ' than the rest of mankind, or an ostentation of ' courage in despising the terrors of another world,
 ' which have so great an influence on what they
 ' call weaker minds; or an aversion to a belief
 ' that must cut them off from many of those
 ' pleasures

‘ pleasures they propose to themselves, and fill ‘ them with remorse for many of those they ‘ have already tasted.

‘ The great received articles of the Christian ‘ religion have been so clearly proved, from the ‘ authority of that divine revelation in which ‘ they are delivered, that it is impossible for those ‘ who have ears to hear, and eyes to see, not ‘ to be convinced of them. But were it possi‘ ble for any thing in the Christian faith to be ‘ erroneous, I can find no ill consequences in ‘ adhering to it. The great points of the incar‘ nation and sufferings of our Saviour produce ‘ naturally such habits of virtue in the mind
 ‘ of man, that I say, supposing it were possible ‘ for us to be mistaken in them, the Infidel him‘ self must at least allow that no other system of ‘ religion could so effectually contribute to the ‘ heightening of morality. They give us great ‘ ideas of the dignity of human nature, and ‘ of the love which the supreme Being bears
 ‘ to his creatures, and consequently engage us ‘ in the highest acts of duty towards our Creator, ‘ our Neighbour, and ourselves. How many ‘ noble arguments has Saint Paul raised from the ‘ chief articles of our religion, for the advancing ‘ of morality in its three great branches? To ‘ give a single example in each kind: What ‘ can be a stronger motive to a firm trust and ‘ reliance on the mercies of our Maker, than the ‘ giving us his Son to suffer for us? What can ‘ make us love and esteem even the most incon‘ siderable of mankind, more than the thought ‘ that Christ died for him? Or what dispose us ‘ to set a stricter guard upon the purity of our ‘ own hearts, than our being members of Christ,

 ‘ and a part of the society of which that immaculate Person is the head? but these are only ‘ a specimen of those admirable enforcements of ‘ morality, which the Apostle has drawn from ‘ the history of our blessed Saviour.

‘ If our modern Infidels considered these ‘ matters with that candour and seriousness which ‘ they deserve, we should not see them act with ‘ such a spirit of bitterness, arrogance, and malice: They would not be raising such insignificant cavils, doubts, and scruples, as may ‘ be started against every thing that is not capable ‘ of mathematical demonstration; in order to ‘ unsettle the minds of the ignorant, disturb
 ‘ the public peace, subvert morality, and throw ‘ all things into confusion and disorder. If none ‘ of these reflexions can have any influence on ‘ them, there is one that perhaps may, because ‘ it is adapted to their vanity, by which they ‘ seem to be guided much more than their ‘ reason. I would therefore have them consider, ‘ that the wisest and best of men, in all ages
 ‘ of the world, have been those who lived up ‘ to the religion of their country, when they saw ‘ nothing in it opposite to morality, and to the ‘ best lights they had of the Divine Nature.
 ‘ Pythagoras’s first rule directs us to worship the ‘ Gods “ as it is ordained by law,” for that is ‘ the most natural interpretation of the precept.
 ‘ Socrates, who was the most renowned among
 ‘ the

‘ the Heathens both for wisdom and virtue, in ‘ his last moments desires his friends to offer ‘ a cock to Æsculapius; doubtless out of a ‘ submissive deference to the established wor‘ ship of his country. Xenophon tells us, that ‘ his Prince (whom he sets forth as a pattern ‘ of perfection) when he found his death ap‘ proaching, offered sacrifices on the mountains ‘ to the Persian Jupiter, and the Sun, “ ac‘ cording to the custom of the Persians,” for ‘ those are the words of the Historian. Nay,
‘ the Epicureans and atomical Philosophers ‘ shewed a very remarkable modesty in this ‘ particular; for though the Being of a God ‘ was intirely repugnant to their schemes of ‘ natural philosophy, they contented themselves ‘ with the denial of a Providence, asserting at ‘ the same time the existence of Gods in ge‘ neral; because they would not shock the ‘ common belief of mankind, and the religion
‘ of their country. L

N^o 187 Thursday, October 4.

— Miseri quibus

Intentata nites —

Hor. Od. 5. l. i. v. 12.

Ah, wretched those who love, yet ne'er did try
The smiling treachery of thy eye! CREECH.

THE intelligence given by this correspondent is so important and useful, in order to avoid the persons he speaks of, that I shall insert his Letter at length.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

I Do not know that you have ever touched upon a certain species of women, whom we ordinarily call Jilts. You cannot possibly go upon a more useful work, than the consideration of these dangerous animals. The Coquette is indeed one degree towards the Jilt; but the heart of the former is bent upon admiring herself, and giving false hopes to her Lovers; but the latter is not contented to be extremely amiable, but she must add to that advantage a certain delight in being a torment to others. Thus when her Lover is in the full expectation of success, the Jilt shall meet him with a sudden indifference, and admiration in her face at his being surpris'd that he is received like a stranger, and a cast of her head

4

another

‘ another way with a pleasant scorn of the fellow’s insolence. It is very probable the Lover goes home utterly astonished and dejected, sits down to his Scrutoir, sends her word in the most abject terms, that he knows not what he has done; that all which was desirable in this life is so suddenly vanished from him, that the charmer of his soul should withdraw the vital heat from the heart which pants for her. He continues a mournful absence for some time, pining in secret, and out of humour with all things which he meets with. At length he takes a resolution to try his fate, and explain with her resolutely upon her unaccountable carriage. He walks up to her apartment, with a thousand inquietudes and doubts in what manner he shall meet the first cast of her eye; when upon his first appearance she flies towards him, wonders where he has been, accuses him of his absence, and treats him with a familiarity as surprising as her former coldness. This good correspondence continues until the Lady observes the Lover grows happy in it, and then she interrupts it with some new inconsistency of behaviour. For (as I just now said) the happiness of a Jilt consists only in the power of making others uneasy. But such is the folly of this sect of women, that they carry on this pretty skittish behaviour, until they have no charms left to render it supportable. Corinna, that used to torment all who conversed with her with false glances, and little heedless unguarded motions, that

‘ were to betray some inclination towards the ‘ man she would insnare, finds at present all she ‘ attempts that way unregarded; and is obliged ‘ to indulge the Jilt in her constitution, by lay‘ ing artificial plots, writing perplexing letters ‘ from unknown hands, and making all the ‘ young fellows in love with her, until they find ‘ out who she is. Thus, as before she gave ‘ torment by disguising her inclination, she now ‘ is obliged to do it by hiding her person.

‘ As for my own part, Mr. SPECTATOR, it ‘ has been my unhappy fate to be jilted from my ‘ youth upward; and as my taste has been very ‘ much towards intrigue, and having intelligence ‘ with women of wit, my whole life has passed ‘ away in a series of impositions. I shall, for ‘ the benefit of the present race of young men, ‘ give some account of my Loves. I know not ‘ whether you have ever heard of the famous ‘ girl about town called Kitty: This creature ‘ (for I must take shame upon myself) was ‘ my mistress in the days when Keeping was ‘ in fashion. Kitty, under the appearance of ‘ being wild, thoughtless, and irregular in all ‘ her words and actions, concealed the most ac‘ complished Jilt of her time. Her negligence ‘ had to me a charm in it like that of chastity, ‘ and want of desires seemed as great a merit ‘ as the conquest of them. The air she gave ‘ herself was that of a romping girl, and whenever ‘ I talked to her with any turn of fondness, she ‘ would immediately snatch off my periwig, try it ‘ upon herself in the glass, clap her arms a kimbow,

‘ draw my sword, and make passes on the wall, ‘ take off my cravat, and seize it to make some ‘ other use of the lace, or run into some ‘ other unaccountable rompishness, until the ‘ time I had appointed to pass away with her ‘ was over. I went from her full of pleasure ‘ at the reflexion that I had the keeping of so ‘ much beauty in a woman, who, as she was too ‘ heedless to please me, was also too unattentive ‘ to form a design to wrong me. Long did I ‘ divert every hour that hung heavy upon me ‘ in the company of this creature, whom I ‘ looked upon as neither guilty, nor innocent, ‘ but could laugh at myself for my unaccount‘ able pleasure in an expence upon her, until in ‘ the end it appeared my pretty Insensible was ‘ with child by my footman.

‘ This accident roused me into a disdain against ‘ all libertine women, under what appearance so‘ ever they hid their insincerity, and I resolved after ‘ that time to converse with none but those who ‘ lived within the rules of decency and honour.
‘ To this end I formed myself into a more regular ‘ turn of behaviour, and began to make visits, ‘ frequent assemblies, and lead out Ladies from the ‘ theatres, with all the other insignificant duties ‘ which the professed servants of the fair place ‘ themselves in constant readiness to perform.
‘ In a very little time, (having a plentiful for‘ tune) fathers and mothers began to regard me ‘ as a good match, and I found easy admittance ‘ into the best families in town to observe their ‘ daughters; but I, who was born to follow the ‘ fair

‘ fair to no purpose, have by the force of my ‘ ill stars made my application to three Jilts ‘ successively.

‘ Hyæna is one of those who form themselves ‘ into a melancholy and indolent air, and en‘ deavour to gain admirers from their inatten-‘ tion to all around them. Hyæna can loll in ‘ her coach, with something so fixed in her ‘ countenance, that it is impossible to conceive ‘ her meditation is employed only on her dress ‘ and her charms in that posture. If it were ‘ not too coarse a simile, I should say, Hyæna, ‘ in the figure she affects to appear in, is a ‘ Spider in the midst of a Cobweb, that is sure ‘ to destroy every fly that approaches it. The net ‘ Hyæna throws is so fine, that you are taken in ‘ it before you can observe any part of her work.
 ‘ I attempted her for a long and weary season, ‘ but I found her passion went no farther than ‘ to be admired; and she is of that unreasonable ‘ temper, as not to value the inconstancy of her ‘ Lovers, provided she can boast she once had ‘ their addresses.

‘ Biblis was the second I aimed at, and ‘ her vanity lay in purchasing the adorers of ‘ others, and not in rejoicing in their love itself.
 ‘ Biblis is no man’s mistress, but every woman’s ‘ rival. As soon as I found this, I fell in love ‘ with Chloe, who is my present pleasure and ‘ torment. I have writ to her, danced with ‘ her, and fought for her, and have been her man ‘ in the sight and expectation of the whole town ‘ these three years, and thought myself near the ‘ end

' end of my wishes; when the other day she ' called me into her closet, and told me, with a ' very grave face, that she was a woman of honour,
 ' and scorned to deceive a man who loved her
 ' with so much sincerity as she saw I did, and ' therefore she must inform me that she was by ' nature the most inconstant creature breath' ing, and begged of me not to marry her; if ' I insisted upon it, I should; but that she ' was lately fallen in Love with another. What ' to do or say I know not, but desire you to ' inform me, and you will infinitely oblige,

Sir,

Your most humble servant,

Charles Yellow.

ADVERTISEMENT.

' Mr. Sly, haberdasher of hats, at the cor' ner of Devereux-court in the Strand, gives ' notice, that he has prepared very neat hats,
 ' rubbers, and brushes for the use of young
 ' tradesmen in the last year of their apprentice' ship, at reasonable rates.' T

... by
 ...ous plea-crowds; but to

N^o 188 Friday, October 5.

Lætus sum laudari à te laudato viro.

Tull.

It gives me pleasure, to be praised by you, whom all men praise.

HE is a very unhappy man who sets his heart upon being admired by the multitude, or affects a general and undistinguishing applause among men. What pious men call the testimony of a good conscience, should be the measure of our ambition in this kind; that is to say, a man of spirit should condemn the praise of the ignorant, and like being applauded for nothing but what he knows in his own heart he deserves. Besides which the character of the person who commends you is to be considered, before you set a value upon his esteem. The praise of an ignorant man is only good-will, and you should receive his kindness as he is a good neighbour in society, and not as a good judge of your actions in point of fame and reputation. The Satyrist said very well of popular praise and acclamations, ‘Give the Tinkers and Cobblers their presents again, and learn to live of yourself.’ It is an argument of a loose and ungoverned mind to be affected with the promiscuous approbation of the generality of mankind; and a man of virtue should be too delicate licate for so coarse an appetite of fame. Men of honour should endeavour only to please the worthy, and the man of merit should desire to be tried only by his peers. I thought it a noble sentiment which I heard yesterday uttered in conversation; 'I know,' said a Gentleman, 'a way to be greater than any man: If he has worth in him, I can rejoice in his superiority to me; and that satisfaction is a greater act of the Soul in me, than any in him which can possibly appear to me.' This thought could not proceed but from a candid and generous spirit; and the approbation of such minds is what may be esteemed true praise: for with the common rate of men there is nothing commendable but what they themselves may hope to be partakers of, and arrive at: But the motive truly glorious is, when the mind is set rather to do things laudable, than to purchase reputation. Where there is that sincerity as the foundation of a good name, the kind opinion of virtuous men will be an unsought, but a necessary consequence. The Lacedæmonians, though a plain people, and no pretenders to politeness, had a certain delicacy in their sense of glory, and sacrificed to the Muses when they entered upon any great enterprize. They would have the commemoration of their actions be transmitted by the purest and most untainted Memorialists. The din which attends victories and public triumphs is by far less eligible, than the recital of the actions of great men by honest and wise Historians. It is a frivolous pleasure to be the admiration of gaping crowds; but

to

to have the approbation of a good man in the cool reflexions of his closet, is a gratification worthy an heroic spirit. The applause of the crowd makes the head giddy, but the attestation of a reasonable man makes the heart glad.

What makes the love of popular or general praise still more ridiculous, is, that it is usually given for circumstances which are foreign to the persons admired. Thus they are the ordinary attendants on power and riches, which may be taken out of one man's hands, and put into another's. The application only, and not the possession, makes those outward things honourable. The vulgar and men of sense agree in admiring men for having what they themselves would rather be possessed of; the wise man applauds him whom he thinks most virtuous, the rest of the world him who is most wealthy.

When a man is in this way of thinking, I do not know what can occur to one more monstrous, than to see persons of ingenuity address their services and performances to men no way addicted to liberal arts: In these cases, the praise on one hand, and the patronage on the other, are equally the objects of ridicule. Dedications to ignorant men are as absurd as any of the speeches of Bulfinch in the droll: Such an address one is apt to translate into other words; and when the different parties are thoroughly considered, the panegyric generally implies no more than if the Author should say to the Patron; My very good Lord, you and I can never understand derstand one another, therefore I humbly desire we may be intimate friends for the future.

The rich may as well ask to borrow of the poor, as the man of virtue or merit hope for addition to his character from any but such as himself. He that commends another engages so much of his own reputation as he gives to that person commended; and he that has nothing laudable in himself is not of ability to be such a surety. The wife Phocion was so sensible how dangerous it was to be touched with what the multitude approved, that, upon a general acclamation made when he was making an oration, he turned to an intelligent friend who stood near him, and asked in a surprized manner, what slip have I made?

I shall conclude this Paper with a billet which has fallen into my hands, and was written to a Lady from a Gentleman whom she had highly commended. The Author of it had formerly been her Lover. When all possibility of commerce between them on the subject of Love was cut off, she spoke so handsomely of him, as to give occasion for this Letter.

M A D A M,

‘ I Should be insensible to a stupidity, if I could ‘ forbear making you my acknowledgements ‘ for your late mention of me with so much ‘ applause. It is, I think, your fate to give ‘ me new sentiments; as you formerly inspired ‘ me with the true sense of Love, so do you ‘ now with the true sense of Glory. As desire ‘ had

' had the least part in the passion I heretofore
 ' professed towards you, so has vanity no share
 ' in the glory to which you have now raised me.
 ' Innocence, knowledge, beauty, virtue, sincerity,
 ' and discretion, are the constant ornaments of ' her who has said this of me. Fame is a bab' bler, but I have arrived at the highest glory
 ' in this world, the commendation of the most ' deserving person in it. T

N^o 189 Saturday, October 6.

—Patriæ pietatis imago.

Virg. Æn. 10. v. 824.

An image of paternal tenderness!

THE following Letter being written to my bookseller, upon a subject of which I treated some time since, I shall publish it in this Paper, together with the Letter that was inclosed in it.

Mr. BUCKLEY,

' MR. SPECTATOR having of late descanted
 ' upon the cruelty of parents to their ' children, I have been induced (at the request ' of several of Mr. SPECTATOR's admirers) to ' inclose this Letter, which I assure you is the ' original from a father to his own son, not' withstanding the latter gave but little or no
 ' provo-

‘ provocation. It would be wonderfully obliging ‘ to the world, if Mr. SPECTATOR would give ‘ his opinion of it in some of his Speculations, ‘ and particularly to

(Mr. Buckley)

Your humble servant.

SIRRAH,

‘ YOU are a faucy audacious rascal, and ‘ both fool and mad, and I care not a far‘ thing whether you comply or no; that does ‘ not raze out my impressions of your insolence, ‘ going about railing at me, and the next day
 ‘ to solicit my favour: These are inconsistencies, ‘ such as discover thy reason depraved. To be ‘ brief, I never desire to see your face; and, ‘ Sirrah, if you go to the work-house, it is no ‘ disgrace to me for you to be supported there;
 ‘ and if you starve in the streets, I will never ‘ give any thing underhand in your behalf. If ‘ I have any more of your scribbling nonsense
 ‘ I will break your head the first time I set ‘ fight on you. You are a stubborn beast; is ‘ this your gratitude for my giving you money?
 ‘ You rogue, I will better your judgment, and ‘ give you a greater sense of your duty to (I re‘ gret to say) your father, &c.

‘ P. S. It is prudence for you to keep out ‘ of my fight; for to reproach me, that might ‘ overcomes right, on the outside of your letter, I ‘ shall give you a great knock on the skull for it.’

Was there ever such an image of paternal tenderness! It was usual among some of the Greeks to make their slaves drink to excess, and then expose them to their children, who by that means conceived an early aversion to a vice which makes men appear so monstrous and irrational. I have exposed this picture of an unnatural father with the same intention, that its deformity may deter others from its resemblance. If the reader has a mind to see a father of the same stamp represented in the most exquisite strokes of humour, he may meet with it in one of the finest Comedies that ever appeared upon the English stage: I mean the part of Sir Sampson in Love for Love.

I must not however engage myself blindly on the side of the son, to whom the fond Letter above-written was directed. His father calls him a 'faucy and audacious rascal' in the first line, and I am afraid upon examination he will prove but an ungracious youth. 'To go about railing' at his father, and to find no other place but 'the outside of his Letter' to tell him 'that might overcomes right', if it does not discover 'his reason to be depraved,' and 'that he is either fool or mad,' as the cholerick old Gentleman tells him, we may at least allow that the father will do very well in endeavouring to 'better his judgment, and give him a greater sense of his duty.' But whether this may be brought about 'by breaking his head, or giving him a great knock on the skull,' ought, I think, to be well considered. Upon the whole, I wish the father father has not met with his match, and that he may not be as equally paired with a son, as the mother in Virgil.

—Crudelis tu quoque mater :

Crudelis mater magis, an puer improbus ille ?

Improbus ille puer, crudelis tu quoque mater.

Ecl. 8. v. 48.

Cruel alike the mother and the son.

Or like the crow and her egg, in the Greek proverb,

Καὶ κόρα καὶ ᾠόν.

Bad the crow, bad the egg.

I must here take notice of a Letter which I have received from an unknown correspondent, upon the subject of my Paper, upon which the foregoing Letter is likewise founded. The writer of it seems very much concerned lest that Paper should seem to give encouragement to the disobedience of children towards their parents; but if the writer of it will take the pains to read it over again attentively, I dare say his apprehensions will vanish. Pardon and reconciliation are all the penitent daughter requests, and all that I contend for in her behalf; and in this case I may use the saying of an eminent Wit, who, upon some great mens pressing him to forgive his daughter who had married against his consent, told them he could refuse nothing to their instances, but that he would have them remember there was difference between giving and forgiving.

I must confess, in all controversies between parents and their children, I am naturally prejudiced in favour of the former. The obligations on that side can never be acquitted, and I think it is one of the greatest reflexions upon human nature that paternal instinct should be a stronger motive to love than filial gratitude; that the receiving of favours should be a less inducement to good-will, tenderness and commiseration, than the conferring of them; and that the taking care of any person should endear the child or dependent more to the parent or benefactor, than the parent or benefactor to the child or dependent; yet so it happens, that for one cruel parent we meet with a thousand undutiful children. This is indeed wonderfully contrived (as I have formerly observed) for the support of every living species; but at the same time that it shews the wisdom of the Creator, it discovers the imperfection and degeneracy of the Creature.

The obedience of children to their parents is the basis of all government, and set forth as the measure of that obedience which we owe to those whom Providence hath placed over us.

It is father Le Compte, if I am not mistaken, who tells us how want of duty in this particular is punished among the Chinese, insomuch that if a son should be known to kill, or so much as to strike his father, not only the criminal but his whole family would be rooted out, nay the the inhabitants of the place where he lived would be put to the sword, nay the place itself would be razed to the ground, and its foundations sown with salt: For, say they, there must have been an utter depravation of manners in that clan or society of people who could have bred up among them so horrid an offender. To this I shall add a passage out of the first book of Herodotus. That Historian in his account of the Persian customs and religion tells us, it is their opinion that no man ever killed his father, or that it is possible such a crime should be in nature; but that if any thing like it should ever happen, they conclude that the reputed son must have been illegitimate, supposititious, or begotten in adultery. Their opinion in this particular shews sufficiently what a notion they must have had of undutifulness in general. L

N^o 190 Monday, October 8.

Servitus crescit nova — Hor. Od. 8. l. 2. v. 18.

A servitude to former times unknown.

SINCE I made some reflexions upon the general negligence used in the case of regard towards women, or, in other words, since I talked of Wenching, I have had epistles upon that subject, which I shall, for the present entertainment, insert as they lie before me.

MR. SPECTATOR,

AS your Speculations are not confined to any part of human life, but concern the wicked as well as the good, I must desire your favourable acceptance of what I, a poor strolling girl about town, have to say to you. I was told by a Roman-catholick Gentleman who picked me up last week, and who I hope, is absolved for what passed between us; I say I was told by such a person, who endeavoured to convert me to his own religion, that in countries where Popery prevails, besides the advantage of licensed stews, there are large endowments given for the Incurabili, I think he called them, such as are past all remedy, and are allowed such maintenance and support as to keep them without farther care until they expire. This manner of treating poor sinners has, methinks, great humanity in it; and as you are a person who pretend to carry your reflexions upon all subjects whatever occur to you, with candour, and act above the sense of what mis-interpretation you may meet with, I beg the favour of you to lay before all the world the unhappy condition of us poor vagrants, who are really in a way of labour instead of idleness. There are crowds of us whose manner of livelihood has long ceased to be pleasing to us; and who would willingly lead a new life, if the rigour of the virtuous did not for ever expel us from coming into the world again. As it now happens, to the eternal

‘nal infamy of the male Sex, falshood among ‘you is not reproachful, but credulity in women ‘is infamous.

‘Give me leave, Sir, to give you my history.
‘You are to know that I am a daughter of a ‘man of a good reputation, tenant to a man of ‘Quality. The Heir of this great house took it ‘in his head to cast a favourable eye upon me, ‘and succeeded. I do not pretend to say he ‘promised me marriage: I was not a creature ‘filly enough to be taken by so foolish a story:
‘But he ran away with me up to this town,
‘and introduced me to a grave matron, with ‘whom I boarded for a day or two with great ‘gravity, and was not a little pleased with the ‘change of my condition, from that of a coun‘try life to the finest company, as I be‘lieved, in the whole world. My humble ‘servant made me understand that I should be ‘always kept in the plentiful condition I then ‘enjoyed; when after a very great fondness to‘wards me, he one day took his leave of me ‘for four or five days. In the evening of the ‘same day my good landlady came to me, and ‘observing me very penfive, began to comfort ‘me, and with a smile told me I must see ‘the world. When I was deaf to all she ‘could say to divert me, she began to tell me ‘with a very frank air that I must be treated as ‘I ought, and not take these squeamish humours ‘upon me, for my friend had left me to the ‘town; and, as their phrase is, she expected I ‘would see company, or I must be treated like

‘ what I had brought myself to. This put me ‘ into a fit of crying: And I immediately, in ‘ a true sense of my condition, threw myself ‘ on the floor, deploring my fate, calling upon ‘ all that was good and sacred to succour me.
‘ While I was in all this agony, I observed a ‘ decrepid old fellow come into the room, and ‘ looking with a sense of pleasure in his face at ‘ all my vehemence and transport. In a pause
‘ of my distress I heard him say to the shame‘ less old woman who stood by me, she is cer‘ tainly a new face, or else she acts it rarely.
‘ With that the Gentlewoman, who was mak‘ ing her market of me, in all the turns of my ‘ person, the heaves of my passion, and the ‘ suitable changes of my posture, took occasion ‘ to commend my neck, my shape, my eyes, ‘ my limbs. All this was accompanied with ‘ such speeches as you may have heard horse-‘ couriers make in the sale of nags, when ‘ they are warranted for their soundness. You ‘ understand by this time that I was left in a ‘ Brothel, and exposed to the next bidder that ‘ could purchase me of my patroness. This is ‘ so much the work of Hell; the pleasure in ‘ the possession of us wenches, abates in pro‘ portion to the degrees we go beyond the ‘ bounds of innocence; and no man is gratified, ‘ if there is nothing left for him to debauch.
‘ Well, Sir, my first man, when I came upon ‘ the town, was Sir Jeoffry Foible, who was ‘ extremely lavish to me of his money, and ‘ took such a fancy to me that he would have ‘ carried me off, if my patroness would have ‘ taken any reasonable terms for me: But as he ‘ was old, his covetousness was his strongest pas‘ sion, and poor I was soon left exposed to be the ‘ common refuse of all the rakes and debauchees

‘ in town. I cannot tell whether you will do ‘ me justice or no, until I see whether you print
‘ this or not; otherwise, as I now live with Sal, ‘ I could give you a very just account of who and ‘ who is together in this town. You perhaps ‘ will not believe it; but I know of one who ‘ pretends to be a very good Protestant who lies ‘ with a Roman-catholick: But more of this ‘ hereafter, as you please me. There do come ‘ to our house the greatest Politicians of the age;
‘ and Sal is more shrewd than any body thinks:
‘ No body can believe that such wise men could ‘ go to Bawdy-houses out of idle purposes; I ‘ have heard them often talk of Augustus Cæsar, ‘ who had intrigues with the wives of Senators,
‘ not out of wantonness but stratagem.

‘ It is a thousand pities you should be so ‘ severely virtuous as I fear you are; otherwise, ‘ after one visit or two, you would soon un‘ derstand that we women of the town are not ‘ such useless correspondents as you may ima‘ gine: You have undoubtedly heard that it ‘ was a Courtesan who discovered Catiline’s
‘ conspiracy. If you print this I will tell you ‘ more; and am in the mean time,

Sir, your most humble servant,

Rebecca Nettletop.

Mr.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

I Am an idle young woman that would work for my livelihood, but that I am kept in such a manner as I cannot stir out. My Tyrant is an old jealous fellow, who allows me nothing to appear in. I have but one shoe and one slipper; no head-dress, and no upper petticoat. As you set up for a Reformer, I desire you would take me out of this wicked way, and keep me yourself.

Eve Afterday.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

I Am to complain to you of a set of impertinent Coxcombs, who visit the apartments of us women of the town, only, as they call it, to see the world. I must confess to you, this to men of delicacy might have an effect to cure them; but as they are stupid, noisy and drunken fellows, it tends only to make vice in themselves, as they think, pleasant and humourous, and at the same time nauseous in us. I shall, Sir, hereafter from time to time give you the names of these wretches who pretend to enter our houses merely as Spectators. These men think it wit to use us ill: Pray tell them, however worthy we are of such treatment, it is unworthy them to be guilty of it towards us. Pray, Sir, take notice of this, and pity the oppressed: I wish we could add to it, the innocent. T

Tuesday,

N^o 191 Tuesday, October 9.

—Ξλον ὄνειρον.

Hom. Il. 2. v. 6.

—Deluding vision of the night.

P O P E.

SOME ludicrous schoolmen have put the case, that if an ass were placed between two bundles of hay, which affected his senses equally on each side, and tempted him in the very same degree, whether it would be possible for him to eat of either. They generally determine this question to the disadvantage of the ass, who they say would starve in the midst of plenty, as not having a single grain of free-will to determine him more to the one than to the other. The bundle of hay on either side striking his sight and smell in the same proportion, would keep him in a perpetual suspense, like the two magnets which, travellers have told us, are placed one of them in the roof, and the other in the floor of Makomet's burying place at Mecca, and by that means, say they, pull the impostor's iron coffin with such an equal attraction, that it hangs in the air between both of them. As for the ass's behaviour in such nice circumstances, whether he would starve sooner than violate his neutrality to the two bundles of hay, I shall not presume to determine; but only take notice of the conduct of our own species in the same perplexity.

perplexity. When a man has a mind to venture his money in a Lottery, every figure of it appears equally alluring, and as likely to succeed as any of its fellows. They all of them have the same pretensions to good-luck, stand upon the same foot of competition, and no manner of reason can be given why a man should prefer one to the other before the Lottery is drawn. In this case therefore caprice very often acts in the place of reason, and forms to itself some groundless imaginary motive, where real and substantial ones are wanting. I know a well-meaning man that is very well pleased to risk his good-fortune upon the Number 1711, because it is the year of our Lord. I am acquainted with a Tacker that would give a good deal for the Number 134. On the contrary I have been told of a certain zealous dissenter, who being a great enemy to popery, and believing that bad men are the most fortunate in this world, will lay two to one on the Number 666 against any other Number, because, says he, it is the Number of the Beast. Several would prefer the Number 12000 before any other, as it is the Number of the pounds in the great prize. In short, some are pleased to find their own age in their Number; some that they have got a Number which makes a pretty appearance in the cyphers; and others, because it is the same Number that succeeded in the last Lottery. Each of these upon no other grounds, thinks he stands fairest for the great lot, and that he is possessed
of

of what may not be improperly called the Golden Number.

These principles of election are the pastimes and extravagancies of human reason, which is of so busy a nature, that it will be exerting itself in the meanest trifles, and working even when it wants materials. The wisest of men are sometimes acted by such unaccountable motives, as the life of the fool and the superstitious is guided by nothing else.

I am surpris'd that none of the Fortune-tellers, or, as the French call them, the Diseurs de bonne Avanture, who publish their bills in every quarter of the town, have not turned our Lotteries to their advantage: Did any of them set up for a caster of fortunate figures, what might he not get by his pretended discoveries and predictions?

I remember among the advertisements in the Post-Boy of September the twenty-seventh, I was surpris'd to see the following one:

' This is to give notice, that ten shillings
' over and above the market-price, will be ' given for the ticket in the 1500000^l. Lottery,
' Number 132, by Nath. Cliff at the Bible and
' Three Crowns in Cheapside.'

This advertisement has given great matter of speculation to Coffee-house Theorists. Mr. Cliff's principles and conversation have been canvass'd upon this occasion, and various conjectures jectures made why he should thus set his heart upon Number 132. I have examined all the powers in those numbers, broken them into fractions, extracted the square and cube root, divided and multiplied them all ways, but could not arrive at the secret until about three days ago, when I received the following Letter from an unknown hand, by which I find that Mr. Nathaniel Cliff is only the agent, and not the principal in this advertisement.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

‘ I Am the person that lately advertised I would ‘ give ten shillings more than the current ‘ price for the Ticket Number 132 in the ‘ Lottery now drawing; which is a secret I ‘ have communicated to some friends, who ‘ rally me incessantly upon that account. You ‘ must know I have but one Ticket, for which ‘ reason and a certain dream I have lately had ‘ more than once, I was resolved it should be ‘ the Number I most approved. I am so posi‘ tive I have pitched upon the great lot, that ‘ I could almost lay all I am worth of it. My ‘ visions are so frequent and strong upon this ‘ occasion, that I have not only possessed the ‘ lot, but disposed of the money which in ‘ all probability it will sell for. This morn‘ ing, in particular, I set up an equipage which ‘ I look upon to be the gayest in the town; the ‘ liveries are very rich, but not gaudy. I should ‘ be very glad to see a Speculation or two upon ‘ Lottery

‘ Lottery subjects, in which you would oblige ‘ all people concerned, and in particular

Your most humble servant,

George Gosling.

P. S. ‘ Dear SPEC, if I get the 12000
‘ pound, I will make thee a handsom present.

After having wished my correspondent good luck, and thanked him for his intended kindness, I shall for this time dismiss the subject of the Lottery, and only observe that the greatest part of mankind are in some degree guilty of my friend Gosling’s extravagance. We are apt to rely upon future prospects, and become really expensive while we are only rich in possibility. We live up to our expectations, not to our possessions, and make a figure proportionable to what we may be, not what we are. We out-run our present income, as not doubting to disburse ourselves out of the profits of some future place, project, or reversion that we have in view. It is through this temper of mind, which is so common among us, that we see tradesmen break, who have met with no misfortunes in their business; and men of estates reduced to poverty, who have never suffered from losses or repairs, tenants, taxes, or law-suits. In short, it is this foolish sanguine temper, this depending upon contingent futurities, that occasions romantic generosity, chimerical grandeur, senseless ostentation, tation, and generally ends in beggary and ruin. The man, who will live above his present circumstances, is in great danger of living in a little time much beneath them, or, as the Italian proverb runs, 'The man who lives by hope will die by hunger.'

It should be an indispensable rule in life, to contract our desires to our present condition, and whatever may be our expectations, to live within the compass of what we actually possess. It will be time enough to enjoy an estate when it comes into our hands; but if we anticipate our good fortune, we shall lose the pleasure of it when it arrives, and may possibly never possess what we have so foolishly counted upon. L

N^o 192 Wednesday, October 10.

— Uno ore omnes omnia
Bona dicere, & laudare fortunas meas,
Qui gnatum haberem tali ingenio præditum.

Ter. Andr. Act. I. Sc. I.

All men agreed in complimenting me, and applauded my good fortune in being the father of so towardly a son.

I Stood the other day, and beheld a father sitting in the middle of a room with a large family of children about him; and methought

I

I could observe in his countenance different motions of delight, as he turned his eye towards the one and the other of them. The man is a person moderate in his designs for their preferment and welfare; and as he has an easy fortune, he is not solicitous to make a great one. His eldest son is a child of a very towardly disposition, and as much as the father loves him, I dare say he will never be a knave to improve his fortune. I do not know any man who has a juster relish of life than the person I am speaking of, or keeps a better guard against the terrors of want or the hopes of gain. It is usual in a crowd of children, for the parent to name out of his own flock all the great officers of the kingdom. There is something so very surprising in the parts of a child of a man's own, that there is nothing too great to be expected from his endowments. I know a good woman who has but three sons, and there is, she says, nothing she expects with more certainty, than that she shall see one of them a Bishop, the other a Judge, and the third a Court-Physician. The humour is, that any thing which can happen to any man's child, is expected by every man for his own. But my friend, whom I was going to speak of, does not flatter himself with such vain expectations, but has his eye more upon the virtue and disposition of his children, than their advancement or wealth. Good habits are what will certainly improve a man's fortune and reputation; but on the other side, affluence of fortune will not as probably produce good affections of the mind.

It is very natural for a man of a kind disposition, to amuse himself with the promises his imagination makes to him of the future condition of his Children, and to represent to himself the figure they shall bear in the world after he has left it. When his prospects of this kind are agreeable, his fondness gives as it were a longer date to his own life; and the survivorship of a worthy man in his son is a pleasure scarce inferior to the hopes of the continuance of his own life. That man is happy who can believe of his son, that he will escape the follies and indiscretions of which he himself was guilty, and pursue and improve every thing that was valuable in him. The continuance of his virtue is much more to be regarded than that of his life; but it is the most lamentable of all reflexions, to think that the heir of a man's fortune is such a one as will be a stranger to his friends, alienated from the same interests, and a promoter of every thing which he himself disapproved. An estate in possession of such a successor to a good man, is worse than laid waste; and the family, of which he is the head, is in a more deplorable condition than that of being extinct.

When I visit the agreeable seat of my honoured friend Ruricola, and walk from room to room revolving many pleasing occurrences, and the expressions of many just sentiments I have heard him utter, and see the booby his heir heir in pain while he is doing the honours of his house to the friend of his father, the heaviness it gives one is not to be expressed. Want of genius is not to be imputed to any man, but want of humanity is a man's own fault. The son of Ruricola, (whose life was one continued series of worthy actions and Gentleman-like inclinations) is the companion of drunken clowns, and knows no sense of praise but in the flattery he receives from his own servants; his pleasures are mean and inordinate, his language base and filthy, his behaviour rough and absurd. Is this creature to be accounted the successor of a man of virtue, wit and breeding? At the same time that I have this melancholy prospect at the house where I miss my old friend, I can go to a Gentleman's not far off it, where he has a daughter who is the picture both of his body and mind, but both improved with the beauty and modesty peculiar to her Sex. It is she who supplies the loss of her father to the world; she, without his name or fortune, is a truer memorial of him, than her brother who succeeds him in both. Such an offspring as the eldest son of my friend perpetuates his father in the same manner as the appearance of his ghost would: It is indeed Ruricola, but it is Ruricola grown frightful.

I know not what to attribute the brutal turn which this young man has taken, except it may be to a certain severity and distance which his father used towards him, and might, perhaps, have occasioned a dislike to those modes of life which were not made amiable to him by freedom and affability.

We may promise ourselves that no such excrescence will appear in the family of the Cornelii, where the father lives with his sons like their eldest brother, and the sons converse with him as if they did it for no other reason but that he is the wisest man of their acquaintance. As the Cornelii are eminent traders, their good correspondence with each other is useful to all that know them, as well as to themselves: And their friendship, good-will and kind offices, are disposed of jointly as well as their fortune, so that no one ever obliged one of them, who had not the obligation multiplied in returns from them all.

It is the most beautiful object the eyes of man can behold, to see a man of worth and his son live in an intire unreserved correspondence. The mutual kindness and affection between them give an inexpressible satisfaction to all who know them. It is a sublime pleasure which increases by the participation. It is as sacred as friendship, as pleasurable as love, and as joyful as religion. This state of mind does not only dissipate sorrow, which would be extreme without it, but enlarges pleasures which would otherwise be contemptible. The most indifferent thing has its force and beauty when it is spoke by a kind father, and an insignificant trifle has its weight when offered by a dutiful child. I know not how to express it, but I think I may call it a transplanted self-love. All the enjoy-

enjoyments and sufferings which a man meets with are regarded only as they concern him in the relation he has to another. A man's very honour receives a new value to him, when he thinks that, when he is in his grave, it will be had in remembrance that such an action was done by such a one's father. Such considerations sweeten the old man's evening, and his soliloquy delights him when he can say to himself, No man can tell my child his father was either unmerciful or unjust: My son shall meet many a man who shall say to him, I was obliged to thy father, and be my child a friend to his child for ever.

It is not in the power of all men to leave illustrious names or great fortunes to their posterity, but they can very much conduce to their having industry, probity, valour and justice: It is in every man's power to leave his son the honour of descending from a virtuous man, and add the blessings of heaven to whatever he leaves him. I shall end this rhapsody with a letter to an excellent young man of my acquaintance, who has lately lost a worthy father.

Dear Sir,

I Know no part of life more impertinent than the office of administering consolation: I will not enter into it, for I cannot but applaud your grief. The virtuous principles you had from that excellent man, whom you have lost, have wrought in you as they ought, to make a youth of three and twenty in-

‘ capable of comfort upon coming into possession ‘ of a great fortune. I doubt not but you will ‘ honour his memory by a modest enjoyment of ‘ his estate; and scorn to triumph over his grave, ‘ by employing in riot, excess, and debauchery, ‘ what he purchased with so much industry, ‘ prudence, and wisdom. This is the true way ‘ to shew the sense you have of your loss, and ‘ to take away the distress of others upon the ‘ occasion. You cannot recall your father by ‘ your grief, but you may revive him to his ‘ friends by your conduct. T

N^o 193 Thursday, October 11.

— Ingentem foribus domus alta superbis Manè salutantum totis vomit ædibus undam.

Virg. Georg. 2. v. 461.

His Lordship's palace, from its stately doors,
 A flood of Levée-hunting mortals pours.

WHEN we look round us, and behold the strange variety of faces and persons which fill the streets with business and hurry, it is no unpleasant amusement to make guesses at their different pursuits, and judge by their countenances what it is that so anxiously engages their present attention. Of all this busy crowd, there are none who would give a man inclined to such inquiries better diversion for his thoughts, than

than those whom we call good Courtiers, and such as are assiduous at the Levées of great men. These Worthies are got into an habit of being servile with an air, and enjoy a certain vanity in being known for understanding how the world passes. In the pleasure of this they can rise early, go abroad sleek and well-dressed, with no other hope or purpose, but to make a bow to a man in Court-favour, and be thought, by some insignificant simile of his, not a little engaged in his interests and fortunes. It is wonderful, that a man can get over the natural existence and possession of his own mind so far, as to take delight either in paying or receiving such cold and repeated civilities. But what maintains the humour is, that outward show is what most men pursue, rather than real happiness. Thus both the idol and idolater equally impose upon themselves in pleasing their imaginations this way. But as there are very many of her Majesty's good subjects, who are extremely uneasy at their own seats in the country, where all from the Skies to the centre of the Earth is their own, and have a mighty longing to shine in Courts, or to be partners in the power of the world; I say, for the benefit of these, and others who hanker after being in the whisper with great men, and vexing their neighbours with the changes they would be capable of making in the appearance at a country sessions, it would not methinks be amiss to give an account of that market for preferment, a great man's Levée.

For ought I know, this commerce between the mighty and their slaves, very justly represented, might do so much good, as to incline the Great to regard business rather than ostentation; and make the Little know the use of their time too well, to spend it in vain applications and addresses.

The famous Doctor in Moorfields, who gained so much reputation for his horary Predictions, is said to have had in his parlour different ropes to little bells which hung in the room above stairs, where the Doctor thought fit to be oraculous. If a girl had been deceived by her lover, one bell was pulled; and if a peasant had lost a cow, the servant rung another. This method was kept in respect to all other passions and concerns, and the skilful waiter below sifted the inquirer, and gave the Doctor notice accordingly. The Levée of a great man is laid after the same manner, and twenty whispers, false alarms, and private intimations, pass backward and forward from the porter, the valet, and the patron himself, before the gaping crew, who are to pay their court, are gathered together: When the scene is ready, the doors fly open and discover his Lordship.

There are several ways of making this first appearance: You may be either half-dressed, and washing yourself, which is indeed the most stately; but this way of opening is peculiar to military men, in whom there is something graceful in exposing themselves naked; but the politicians, or civil officers, have usually affected to be

be more reserved, and preserve a certain chastity of deportment. Whether it be hieroglyphical or not, this difference in the military and civil list, I will not say; but have ever understood the fact to be, that the close minister is buttoned up, and the brave officer open-breasted on these occasions.

However that is, I humbly conceive the business of a Levée is to receive the acknowledgments of a multitude, that a man is wise, bounteous, valiant and powerful. When the first shot of eyes is made, it is wonderful to observe how much submission the Patron's modesty can bear, and how much servitude the Client's spirit can descend to. In the vast multiplicity of business, and the crowd about him, my Lord's parts are usually so great, that, to the astonishment of the whole assembly, he has something to say to every man there, and that so suitable to his capacity as any man may judge that it is not without talents that men can arrive at great employments. I have known a Great man ask a Flag-officer, which way was the wind, a Commander of horse the present price of oats, and a Stock-jobber at what discount such a fund was, with as much ease as if he had been bred to each of those several ways of life. Now this is extremely obliging; for at the same time that the Patron informs himself of matters, he gives the person of whom he inquires an opportunity to exert himself. What adds to the pomp of those interviews is, that it is performed with the greatest silence and order imaginable. The Patron

Patron is usually in the midst of the room, and some humble person gives him a whisper, which his Lordship answers aloud, 'It is well. 'Yes, I am of your opinion. Pray inform yourself further, you may be sure of my part in it.' This happy man is dismissed, and my Lord can turn himself to a business of a quite different nature, and off-hand give as good an answer as any great man is obliged to. For the chief point is to keep in generals, and if there be any thing offered that is particular, to be in haste.

But we are now in the height of the affair, and my Lord's creatures have all had their whispers round to keep up the farce of the thing, and the dumb show is become more general. He casts his eye to that corner, and there to Mr. Such-a-one; to the other, 'And when did you come to town?' And perhaps just before he nods to another; and enters with him, 'But, Sir, I am glad to see you, now I think of it.' Each of those are happy for the next four and twenty hours; and those who bow in ranks undistinguished, and by dozens at a time, think they have very good prospects if they may hope to arrive at such notices half a year hence.

The satyrist says, there is seldom common sense in high fortune; and one would think, to behold a Levée, that the Great were not only infatuated with their station, but also that they believed all below were seized too; else how is it possible they could think of imposing upon themselves and others in such a degree, as to set up a Levée for any thing but a direct farce? But such is the weakness of our nature, that when men are a little exalted in their condition, they immediately conceive they have additional senses, and their capacities enlarged not only above other men, but above human comprehension itself. Thus it is ordinary to see a great man attend one listening, bow to one at a distance, and call to a third at the same instant. A girl in new ribbands is not more taken with herself, nor does she betray more apparent coquetries, than even a wise man in such a circumstance of courtship. I do not know any thing that I ever thought so very distasteful as the affectation which is recorded of Cæsar, to wit, that he would dictate to three several writers at the same time. This was an ambition below the greatness and candour of his mind. He indeed (if any man had pretensions to greater faculties than any other mortal) was the person; but such a way of acting is childish, and inconsistent with the manner of our Being. And it appears from the very nature of things, that there cannot be any thing effectually dispatched in the distraction of a publick Levée; but the whole seems to be a conspiracy of a set of servile Slaves, to give up their own liberty to take away their Patron's understanding.

N^o 194 Friday, October 12.

—Difficili bile tumet jecur. Hor. Od. 13. l. i. v. 4.

Anger boils up in my hot lab'ring breast.

GLANVIL.

THE present Paper shall consist of two Letters, which observe upon faults that are easily cured both in love and friendship. In the latter, as far as it merely regards conversation, the person who neglects visiting an agreeable friend is punished in the very transgression; for a good companion is not found in every room we go into. But the case of Love is of a more delicate nature, and the anxiety is inexpressible if every little instance of kindness is not reciprocal. There are things in this sort of commerce which there are not words to express, and a man may not possibly know how to represent, what yet may tear his heart into ten thousand tortures. To be grave to a man's mirth, unattentive to his discourse, or to interrupt either with something that argues a disinclination to be entertained by him, has in it something so disagreeable, that the utmost steps which may be made in farther enmity cannot give greater torment. The gay Corinna, who sets up for an indifference and becoming heedlessness, gives her husband

all

all the torment imaginable out of mere indolence, with this peculiar vanity, that she is to look as gay as a maid in the character of a wife. It is no matter what is the reason of a man's grief, if it be heavy as it is. Her unhappy man is convinced that she means him no dishonour, but pines to death because she will not have so much deference to him as to avoid the appearances of it. The Author of the following Letter is perplexed with an injury that is in a degree yet less criminal, and yet the source of the utmost unhappiness.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

I Have read your Papers which relate to Jealousy, and desire your advice in my case, which you will say is not common. I have a wife, of whose virtue I am not in the least doubtful; yet I cannot be satisfied she loves me, which gives me as great uneasiness as being faulty the other way would do. I know not whether I am not yet more miserable than in that case, for she keeps possession of my heart, without the return of hers. I would desire your observations upon that temper in some women, who will not condescend to convince their husbands of their innocence or their love, but are wholly negligent of what reflexions the poor men make upon their conduct (so they cannot call it criminal,) when at the same time a little tenderness of behaviour, or regard to shew an inclination

‘ inclination to please them, would make them
‘ intirely at ease. Do not such women deserve ‘ all the misinterpretation which they neglect ‘ to avoid? Or are they not in the actual prac‘ tice of guilt, who care not whether they are ‘ thought guilty or not? If my wife does the ‘ most ordinary thing, as visiting her sister, or ‘ taking the air with her mother, it is always ‘ carried with the air of a secret: Then she ‘ will sometimes tell a thing of no consequence, ‘ as if it was only want of memory made her ‘ conceal it before; and this only to dally with ‘ my anxiety. I have complained to her of ‘ this behaviour in the gentlest terms imagin‘ able, and beseeched her not to use him, who ‘ desired only to live with her like an indulgent ‘ friend, as the most morose and unfociable ‘ husband in the world. It is no easy matter ‘ to describe our circumstance, but it is miserable ‘ with this aggravation, that it might be easily ‘ mended, and yet no remedy endeavoured. She ‘ reads you, and there is a phrase or two in this ‘ Letter which she will know came from me.
‘ If we enter into an explanation which may ‘ tend to our future quiet by your means, you ‘ shall have our joint thanks; in the mean time ‘ I am (as much as I can in this ambiguous ‘ condition be any thing)

Sir,

Your humble servant.

Mr.

MR. SPECTATOR,

GIVE me leave to make you a present of a character not yet described in your Papers, which is that of a man who treats his friend with the same odd variety which a fantastical female tyrant practises towards her Lover. I have for some time had a friendship with one of these mercurial persons: The rogue I know loves me, yet takes advantage of my fondness for him to use me as he pleases. We are by turns the best friends and the greatest strangers imaginable: Sometimes you would think us inseparable; at other times he avoids me for a long time, yet neither he nor I know why. When we meet next by chance, he is amazed he has not seen me, is impatient for an appointment the same evening: and when I expect he should have kept it, I have known him slip away to another place; where he has sat reading the news, when there is no post; smoking his pipe, which he seldom cares for; and staring about him in company with whom he has had nothing to do, as if he wondered how he came there.

That I may state my case to you the more fully, I shall transcribe some short minutes I have taken of him in my almanac since last spring; for you must know there are certain seasons of the year, according to which, I will not say our friendship, but the enjoyment of it rises or falls. In March and and April he was as various as the weather; in May and part of June, I found him the sprightliest best-humoured fellow in the world; in the dog-days he was much upon the indolent; in September very agreeable but very busy; and since the glass fell last to changeable, he has made three appointments with me, and broke them every one. However I have good hopes of him this winter, especially if you will lend me your assistance to reform him, which will be a great ease and pleasure to,

October 9, 1711.

Sir,

Your most humble servant.

T

N^o 195 Saturday, October 13.

Νήπιοι, ἐδ' ἴσασιν ὅσῳ πλέον ἤμισυ παῖς,
 Οὐδ' ὅσον ἐν μαλάχῃ, τε δὲ ἀσφοδέλω μέγ' ὕψιστος.

Hes. Oper. & Dier. l. i. v. 40.

Fools, not to know that half exceeds the whole,
 Nor the great blessings of a frugal board.

THERE is a story in the Arabian Nights
Tales, of a King who had long languished under an ill habit of body, and had taken abundance of remedies to no purpose. At length, says the fable, a physician cured him by the following

following method: He took an hollow ball of wood, and filled it with several drugs; after which he closed it up so artificially that nothing appeared. He likewise took a maul, and after having hollowed the handle, and that part which strikes the ball, he inclosed in them several drugs after the same manner as in the ball itself. He then ordered the Sultan, who was his patient, to exercise himself early in the morning with these rightly prepared instruments, until such time as he should sweat: When, as the story goes, the virtue of the medicaments perspiring through the wood, had so good an influence on the Sultan's constitution, that they cured him of an indisposition which all the compositions he had taken inwardly had not been able to remove. This eastern allegory is finely contrived to shew us how beneficial bodily labour is to health, and that Exercise is the most effectual physic. I have described in my hundred and fifteenth paper, from the general structure and mechanism of an human body, how absolutely necessary Exercise is for its preservation: I shall in this place recommend another great preservative of health, which in many cases produces the same effects as Exercise, and may, in some measure, supply its place, where opportunities of Exercise are wanting. The preservative I am speaking of is Temperance, which has those particular advantages above all other means of health, that it may be practised by all ranks and conditions, at any season or in any place. It is a kind of regimen into which every man may put himself; out interruption to business, expence of money, or loss of time. If Exercise throws off all superfluities, Temperance prevents them; if Exercise clears the vessels, Temperance neither fatiates nor overstrains them; if Exercise raises proper ferments in the humours, and promotes the circulation of the blood, Temperance gives Nature her full play, and enables her to exert herself in all her force and vigour; if Exercise dissipates a growing distemper, Temperance starves it.

Physic, for the most part, is nothing else but the substitute of Exercise or Temperance. Medicines are indeed absolutely necessary in acute distempers, that cannot wait the slow operations of these two great instruments of health; but did men live in an habitual course of Exercise and Temperance, there would be but little occasion for them. Accordingly we find that those parts of the world are the most healthy, where they subsist by the chase; and that men lived longest when their lives were employed in hunting, and when they had little food besides what they caught. Blistering, cupping, bleeding, are seldom of use but to the idle and intemperate; as all those inward applications which are so much in practice among us, are for the most part nothing else but expedients to make luxury consistent with health. The Apothecary is perpetually employed in countermining the Cook and the Vintner. It is said of Diogenes, that meeting a young man who was going to a feast, he took him up in the street and carried him him home to his friends, as one who was running into imminent danger, had not he prevented him. What would that Philosopher have said, had he been present at the gluttony of a modern meal? Would not he have thought the master of a family mad, and have begged his servants to tie down his hands, had he seen him devour fowl, fish, and flesh; swallow oil and vinegar, wines and spices; throw down salads of twenty different herbs, sauces of an hundred ingredients, confections and fruits of numberless sweets and flavours? What unnatural motions and counterferments must such a medley of intemperance produce in the body? For my part, when I behold a fashionable table set out in all its magnificence, I fancy that I see gout and dropsies, fevers and lethargies, with other innumerable distempers lying in ambuscade among the dishes.

Nature delights in the most plain and simple diet. Every animal, but man, keeps to one dish. Herbs are the food of this species, fish of that, and flesh of a third. Man falls upon every thing that comes in his way, not the smallest fruit or excrescence of the earth, scarce a berry or a mushroom, can escape him.

It is impossible to lay down any determinate rule for Temperance, because what is Luxury in one may be Temperance in another; but there are few that have lived any time in the world, who are not judges of their own constitutions, so far as to know what kinds and what proportions of food do best agree with them. Were I to consider my readers as my patients, and to prescribe such a kind of Temperance as is accommodated to all persons, and such as is particularly suitable to our climate and way of living, I would copy the following rules of a very eminent Physician. Make your whole repast out of one dish. If you indulge in a second, avoid drinking any thing strong, until you have finished your meal; at the same time abstain from all sauces, or at least such as are not the most plain and simple. A man could not be well guilty of gluttony, if he stuck to these few obvious and easy rules. In the first case there would be no variety of tastes to solicit his palate, and occasion excess; nor in the second any artificial provocatives to relieve satiety, and create a false appetite. Were I to prescribe a rule for drinking, it should be formed upon a saying quoted by Sir William Temple; ‘The first glass for myself, the second for my friends, the third for good-humour, and the fourth for mine enemies.’ But because it is impossible for one who lives in the world to diet himself always in so philosophical a manner, I think every man should have his days of abstinence, according as his constitution will permit. These are great reliefs to Nature, as they qualify her for struggling with hunger and thirst, whenever any distemper or duty of life may put her upon such difficulties; and at the same time give her an opportunity of extricating herself from her oppressions, and recovering the several tones and springs of her distended vessels. Besides that abstinence well timed often kills a sickness in embryo, embryo, and destroys the first seeds of an indisposition. It is observed by two or three ancient Authors, that Socrates, notwithstanding he lived in Athens during that great plague, which has made so much noise through all ages, and has been celebrated at different times by such eminent hands; I say, notwithstanding that he lived in the time of this devouring pestilence, he never caught the least infection, which those writers unanimously ascribe to that uninterrupted Temperance which he always observed.

And here I cannot but mention an observation which I have often made, upon reading the lives of the Philosophers, and comparing them with any series of Kings or great men of the same number. If we consider these ancient Sages, a great part of whose philosophy consisted in a temperate and abstemious course of life, one would think the life of a Philosopher and the life of a Man were of two different dates. For we find that the generality of these wise men were nearer an hundred than sixty years of age at the time of their respective deaths. But the most remarkable instance of the efficacy of Temperance towards the procuring of long life, is what we meet with in a little book published by Lewis Cornaro the Venetian; which I the rather mention, because it is of undoubted credit, as the late Venetian Ambassador, who was of the same family, attested more than once in conversation, when he resided in England. Cornaro, who was the Author of the little treatise I am mentioning, was of an infirm constitution, until about forty, when by obstinately persisting in an exact course of Temperance, he recovered a perfect state of health; insomuch that at fourscore he published his book, which has been translated into English under the title of Sure and certain Methods of attaining a long and healthy Life. He lived to give a third or fourth edition of it, and after having passed his hundredth year, died without pain or agony, and like one who falls asleep. The treatise I mention has been taken notice of by several eminent Authors, and is written with such a spirit of chearfulness, religion, and good sense, as are the natural concomitants of Temperance and Sobriety. The mixture of the old man in it is rather a recommendation than a discredit to it.

Having designed this Paper as the sequel to that upon Exercise, I have not here considered Temperance as it is a moral virtue, which I shall make the subject of a future Speculation, but only as it is the means of health. L

N^o 196 Monday, October 15.Est Ulubris, animus si te non deficit æquus.

Hor. Ep. II. l. I. v. 30.

True happiness is to no place confin'd,
But still is found in a contented mind.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

THERE is a particular fault which I have observed in most of the Moralists in all ages, and that is, that they are always professing themselves, and teaching others to be happy. This state is not to be arrived at in this life, therefore I would recommend to you to talk in an humbler strain than your predecessors have done, and instead of presuming to be happy, instruct us only to be easy. The thoughts of him who would be discreet, and aim at practical things, should turn upon allaying our pain rather than promoting our joy. great inquietude is to be avoided, but great felicity is not to be attained. The great lesson is Æquanimity, a regularity of spirit, which is a little above cheerfulness and below mirth. Cheerfulness is always to be supported if a man is out of pain, but mirth to a prudent man should always be accidental: It should naturally arise out of the occasion, and the occasion seldom be laid for it; for those tempers who ‘ want mirth to be pleased, are like the constitutions which flag without the use of Brandy. Therefore, I say, let your precept be, Be easy. That mind is dissolute and ungoverned, which must be hurried out of itself by loud laughter or sensual pleasure, or else be wholly unactive.

‘ There are a couple of old fellows of my acquaintance who meet every day and smoke a pipe, and by their mutual love to each other, though they have been men of business and bustle in the world, enjoy a greater tranquillity than either could have worked himself into by any chapter of Seneca. Indolence of body and mind, when we aim at no more, is very frequently enjoyed; but the very inquiry after Happiness has something restless in it, which a man who lives in a series of temperate meals, friendly conversations, and easy slumbers, gives himself no trouble about. While men of refinement are talking of tranquillity, he possesses it.

‘ What I would by these broken expressions recommend to you, Mr. SPECTATOR, is, that you would speak of the way of life, which plain men may pursue, to fill up the spaces of time with satisfaction. It is a lamentable circumstance, that wisdom, or, as you call it, philosophy, should furnish ideas only for the learned; and that a man must be a philosopher to know how to pass away his time agreeably. It would therefore be worth your pains to place in an handsome light the relations and affinities among men, which render their conversation

‘ conversation with each other so grateful, that the ‘ highest talents give but an impotent pleasure ‘ in comparison with them. You may find de‘ scriptions and discourses which will render ‘ the fire-side of an honest artificer as entertain‘ ing as your own club is to you. Good-nature ‘ has an endless source of pleasures in it; and ‘ the representation of domestic life filled with ‘ its natural gratifications, (instead of the neces‘ sary vexations which are generally insisted upon ‘ in the writings of the witty) will be a very ‘ good office to society.

‘ The vicissitudes of labour and rest in the ‘ lower part of mankind, make their Being ‘ pass away with that sort of relish which we ‘ express by the word Comfort; and should be ‘ treated of by you, who are a SPECTATOR, as ‘ well as such subjects which appear indeed ‘ more speculative, but are less instructive. In ‘ a word, Sir, I would have you turn your ‘ thoughts to the advantage of such as want you ‘ most; and shew that simplicity, innocence, ‘ industry and temperance, are arts which lead
 ‘ to tranquillity, as much as learning, wisdom, ‘ knowledge, and contemplation.

I am, Sir,

Your most humble servant,

T. B.

Mr. SPECTATOR, Hackney, October 12.

‘ I Am the young woman whom you did so ‘ much justice to some time ago, in acknow‘ ledging that I am perfect mistress of the Fan, and use it with the utmost knowledge and dexterity. Indeed the world, as malicious as it is, will allow, that from an hurry of laughter I recollect myself the most suddenly, make a courtesy, and let fall my hands before me, closing my fan at the same instant, the best of any woman in England. I am not a little delighted that I have had your notice and approbation; and however other young women may rally me out of envy, I triumph in it, and demand a place in your friendship. You must therefore permit me to lay before you the present state of my mind. I was reading your Spectator of the ninth instant, and thought the circumstance of the Afs divided between two bundles of hay which equally affected his senses, was a lively representation of my present condition: For you are to know that I am extremely enamoured with two young Gentlemen who at this time pretend to me. One must hide nothing when one is asking advice, therefore I will own to you, that I am very amorous and very covetous. My lover Will is very rich, and my lover Tom very handsom. I can have either of them when I please: But when I debate the question in my own mind, I cannot take Tom for fear of losing Will's estate, nor enter upon Will's estate, and bid adieu to Tom's person. I am very young, and yet no one in the world, dear Sir, has the main chance more in her head than myself. Tom is the gayest, the blithest creature! He dances well, is very civil, and diverting at all hours and seasons:
 ‘ and

‘ Oh he is the joy of my eyes! But then again ‘ Will is so very rich and careful of the main.
‘ How many pretty dresses does Tom appear in to ‘ charm me! But then it immediately occurs ‘ to me, that a man of his circumstances is so ‘ much the poorer. Upon the whole, I have ‘ at last examined both these desires of love ‘ and avarice, and upon strictly weighing the ‘ matter I begin to think I shall be covetous ‘ longer than fond; therefore if you have no‘ thing to say to the contrary, I shall take Will.
‘ Alas, poor Tom!

Your humble servant,

T

Biddy Loveless.

Tuesday,

N^o 197 Tuesday, October 16.

*Alter rixatur de lanâ sæpe caprinâ, et Propugnat nugis armatus: scilicet, ut non Sit mihi prima fides; & verè quod placet, ut non Acriter elatrem, pretium ætas altera sordet.
 Ambigitur quid enim? Castor sciat, an Docilis plus, Brundisium Numici melius via ducat, an Appi.*

Hor. Ep. 18. l. i. v. 15.

One strives for trifles, and for toys contends:
 He is in earnest; what he says, defends:
 ' That I should not be trusted, right or wrong,
 ' Or be debarr'd the freedom of my tongue,
 ' And not bawl what I please! to part with this,
 ' I think another life too mean a price.'
 The question is—pray, what?—why, which can boast,
 Or Docilis, or Castor, knowing most;
 Or whether thro' Numicum been't as good
 To fair Brundisium, as the Appian road.

CREECH.

EVERY age a man passes through, and way of life he engages in, has some particular vice or imperfection naturally cleaving to it, which it will require his nicest care to avoid. The several weaknesses, to which youth, old age, and manhood are exposed, have long since been set down by many both of the Poets and Philosophers; but I do not remember to have met with any author who has treated of those ill habits men are subject to, not so much by reason of their

their different ages and tempers, as the particular profession or business in which they were educated and brought up.

I am the more surpris'd to find this subject so little touch'd on, since what I am here speaking of is so apparent, as not to escape the most vulgar observation. The business men are chiefly conversant in, does not only give a certain cast or turn to their minds, but is very often apparent in their outward behaviour, and some of the most indifferent actions of their Lives. It is this air diffusing itself over the whole man, which helps us to find out a person at his first appearance; so that the most careless observer fancies he can scarce be mistaken in the carriage of a Seaman or the gait of a Tailor.

The liberal arts, though they may possibly have less effect on our external mien and behaviour, make so deep an impression on the mind, as is very apt to bend it wholly one way.

The Mathematician will take little less than demonstration in the most common discourse, and the Schoolman is as great a friend to definitions and syllogisms. The Physician and Divine are often heard to dictate in private companies with the same authority which they exercise over their patients and disciples; while the Lawyer is putting cases and raising matter for disputation out of every thing that occurs.

I may possibly some time or other animadvert more at large on the particular fault each profession is most infected with; but shall at present wholly apply myself to the cure of what

what I last mentioned, namely that spirit of strife and contention in the conversations of Gentlemen of the long robe.

This is the more ordinary, because these Gentlemen regarding argument as their own proper province, and very often making ready-money of it, think it unsafe to yield before company. They are shewing in common talk how zealously they could defend a cause in Court, and therefore frequently forget to keep that temper which is absolutely requisite to render conversation pleasant and instructive.

Captain SENTRY pushes this matter so far, that I have heard him say, 'He has known but few pleaders that were tolerable company.'

The Captain, who is a man of good sense, but dry conversation, was last night giving me an account of a discourse, in which he had lately been engaged with a young wrangler in the law. I was giving my opinion, says the Captain, without apprehending any debate that might arise from it, of a General's behaviour in a battle that was fought some years before either the Templar or myself were born. The young Lawyer immediately took me up, and by reasoning above a quarter of an hour upon a subject which I saw he understood nothing of, endeavoured to shew me that my opinions were ill-grounded. Upon which, says the Captain, to avoid any farther contests, I told him, that truly I had not considered those several arguments which he had brought against me, and that there might be a great deal in them.

Ay, but says my antagonist, who would not let me escape so, there are several things to be urged in favour of your opinion which you have omitted; and thereupon begun to shine on the other side of the question. Upon this, says the Captain, I came over to my first sentiments, and intirely acquiesced in his reasons for my so doing. Upon which the Templar again recovered his former posture, and confuted both himself and me a third time. In short, says my friend, I found he was resolved to keep me at sword's length, and never let me close with him, so that I had nothing left but to hold my tongue, and give my antagonist free leave to smile at his victory, who I found, like Hudibras, 'could still 'change sides, and still confute.'

For my own part, I have ever regarded our Inns of Court as nurseries of statesmen and law-givers, which makes me often frequent that part of the town with great pleasure.

Upon my calling in lately at one of the most noted Temple coffee-houses, I found the whole room, which was full of young students, divided into several parties, each of which was deeply engaged in some controversy. The management of the late ministry was attacked and defended with great vigour; and several preliminaries to the peace were proposed by some, and rejected by others; the demolishing of Dunkirk was so eagerly insisted on, and so warmly controverted, as had like to have produced a challenge. In short, I observed that the desire of victory, whetted with the little prejudices of party and interest, generally carried the argument to such a height, as made the disputants insensibly conceive an aversion towards each other, and part with the highest dissatisfaction on both sides.
and

The managing an argument handsomely being so nice a point, and what I have seen so very few excel in, I shall here set down a few rules on that head, which, among other things, I gave in writing to a young kinsman of mine, who had made so great a proficiency in the Law, that he began to plead in company, upon every subject that was started.

Having the intire manuscript by me, I may, perhaps, from time to time, publish such parts of it as I shall think requisite for the instruction of the British youth. What regards my present purpose is as follows :

Avoid disputes as much as possible. In order to appear easy and well-bred in conversation, you may assure yourself that it requires more wit, as well as more good-humour, to improve than to contradict the notions of another: But if you are at any time obliged to enter on an argument, give your reasons with the utmost coolness and modesty, two things which scarce ever fail of making an impression on the hearers. Besides, if you are neither dogmatical, nor shew either by your actions or words, that you are full of yourself, all will the more heartily rejoice at your victory. Nay should you be pinched in your argument, you may make your retreat with a very good grace: You were never positive, and are now glad to be better informed. This has made some approve the Socratical way of reasoning, where, while you scarce affirm any thing, you can hardly be caught in an absurdity, and though possibly you are endeavouring to bring over another to your opinion, which is firmly fixed, you seem only to desire information from him.

In order to keep that temper which is so difficult, and yet so necessary to preserve, you may please to consider, that nothing can be more unjust or ridiculous, than to be angry with another because he is not of your opinion. The interests, education, and means by which men attain their knowledge, are so very different, that it is impossible they should all think alike; and he has at least as much reason to be angry with you, as you with him. Sometimes to keep yourself cool, it may be of service to ask yourself fairly, what might have been your opinion, had you all the biases of education and interest your adversary may possibly have? But if you contend for the honour of victory alone, you may lay down this as an infallible maxim, that you cannot make a more false step, or give your antagonist a greater advantage over you, than by falling into a passion.

When an argument is over, how many weighty reasons does a man recollect, which his heat and violence made him utterly forget?

It is yet more absurd to be angry with a man because he does not apprehend the force of your reasons, or give weak ones of his own.

If you argue for reputation, this makes your victory the easier; he is certainly in all respects an object of your pity, rather than anger; and if he cannot comprehend what you do, you ought to thank nature for her favours, who has given you so much the clearer understanding.

You may please to add this consideration, that among your equals no one values your anger, which only preys upon its master; and perhaps you may find it is not very consistent either with prudence or your ease, to punish yourself whenever you meet with a fool or a knave.

Lastly, if you propose to yourself the true end of argument, which is information, it may be a seasonable check to your passion; for if you search purely after truth, it will be almost indifferent to you where you find it. I cannot in this place omit an observation which I have often made, namely, that nothing procures a man more esteem and less envy from the whole company, than if he chooses the part of moderator, without engaging directly on either side in a dispute. This gives him the character of impartial, furnishes him with an opportunity of sifting things to the bottom, shewing his judgment, and of sometimes making handsome compliments to each of the contending parties.

I shall close this subject with giving you one caution; when you have gained a victory, do not push it too far; it is sufficient to let the company and your adversary see it is in your power, but that you are too generous to make use of it,

X

Wednesday,

N^o 198 Wednesday, October 17.

*Cervæ luporum præda rapacium
Sectamur ultro, quos opimus Fallere & effugere est triumphus.*

Hor. Od. 4. l. 4. v. 50.

We, like the stag, the brinded wolf provoke,
And, when retreat is victory,
Rush on, though sure to die. ANON.

THERE is a species of women, whom I shall distinguish by the name of Salamanders. Now a Salamander is a kind of Heroine in chastity, that treads upon fire, and lives in the midst of flames without being hurt. A Salamander knows no distinction of Sex in those she converses with, grows familiar with a stranger at first sight, and is not so narrow-spirited as to observe whether the person she talks to be in breeches or petticoats. She admits a male visitant to her bed-side, plays with him a whole afternoon at piquet, walks with him two or three hours by moonlight, and is extremely scandalized at the unreasonableness of an husband, or the severity of a parent, that would debar the Sex from such innocent liberties. Your Salamander is therefore a perpetual declaimer against jealousy, and admirer of the French good-breeding, and a great stickler for freedom in conversation. In short, the Salamander lives in an invincible state of simplicity and innocence: Her constitution is preserved in a kind of natural frost; she wonders what people mean by temptations, and defies mankind to do their worst. Her chastity is engaged in a constant Ordeal, or fiery trial: Like good Queen Emma, the pretty Innocent walks blindfold among burning plough-shares, without being scorched or singed by them.

It is not therefore for the use of the Salamander, whether in a married or single state of life, that I design the following Paper; but for such females only as are made of flesh and blood, and find themselves subject to human frailties.

As for this part of the fair Sex who are not of the Salamander kind, I would most earnestly advise them to observe a quite different conduct in their behaviour; and to avoid as much as possible what religion calls Temptations, and the world Opportunities. Did they but know how many thousands of their Sex have been gradually betrayed from innocent freedoms to ruin and infamy; and how many millions of ours have begun with flatteries, protestations and endearments, but ended with reproaches, perjury, and perfidiousness; they would shun like death the very first approaches of one that might lead them into inextricable labyrinths of guilt and misery. I must so far give up the cause of the male world, as to exhort the female Sex in the language of Chamont in the Orphan;

Trust not a man, we are by nature false,
Dissembling, subtle, cruel, and unconstant ;
When a man talks of Love, with caution trust him:
But if he swears, he'll certainly deceive thee.

I might very much enlarge upon this subject, but shall conclude it with a story which I lately heard from one of our Spanish Officers, and which may shew the danger a woman incurs by too great familiarities with a male companion.

An inhabitant of the kingdom of Castile, being a man of more than ordinary prudence, and of a grave composed behaviour, determined about the fiftieth year of his age to enter upon wedlock. In order to make himself easy in it, he cast his eye upon a young woman who had nothing to recommend her but her beauty and her education, her parents having been reduced to great poverty by the wars, which for some years have laid that whole country waste. The Castilian having made his addreses to her and married her, they lived together in perfect happiness for some time ; when at length the husband's affairs made it necessary for him to take a voyage to the kingdom of Naples where a great part of his estate lay. The wife loved him too tenderly to be left behind him. They had not been a ship-board above a day, when they unluckily fell into the hands of an Algerine pirate, who carried the whole company on shore, and made them slaves. The Castilian and his wife had the comfort to be under the same master ; who seeing how dearly they loved one another, and gasped after their liberty, demanded a most exorbitant price for their ransom. The Castilian, though he would rather have died in slavery himself, than have paid such a sum as he found would go near to ruin him, was so moved with compassion towards his wife, that he sent repeated orders to his friend in Spain, (who happened to be his next relation) to sell his estate, and transmit the money to him. His friend hoping that the terms of his ransom might be made more reasonable, and unwilling to sell an estate which he himself had some prospect of inheriting, formed so many delays, that three whole years passed away without any thing being done for the setting them at liberty.
M 3 their

There happened to live a French Renegado in the same place where the Castilian and his wife were kept prisoners. As this fellow had in him all the vivacity of his nation, he often entertained the captives with accounts of his own adventures; to which he sometimes added a song or a dance, or some other piece of mirth, to divert them during their confinement. His acquaintance with the manners of the Algerines, enabled him likewise to do them several good offices. The Castilian, as he was one day in conversation with this Renegado, discovered to him the negligence and treachery of his correspondent in Castile, and at the same time asked his advice how he should behave himself in that exigency: He further told the Renegado, that he found it would be impossible for him to raise the money, unless he himself might go over to dispose of his estate.

The Renegado, after having represented to him that his Algerine master would never consent to his release upon such a pretence, at length contrived a method for the Castilian to make his escape in the habit of a Seaman. The Castilian succeeded in his attempt; and having sold his estate, being afraid lest the money should miscarry by the way, and determining to perish with it rather than lose one who was much dearer to him than his life, he returned himself in a little vessel that was going to Algiers. It is impossible to describe the joy he felt upon this occasion, when he considered that he should soon see the wife whom he so much loved, and endear himself more to her by this uncommon piece of generosity.

The Renegado, during the husband's absence, so insinuated himself into the good graces of his young wife, and so turned her head with stories of gallantry, that she quickly thought him the finest Gentleman she had ever conversed with. To be brief, her mind was quite alienated from the honest Castilian, whom she was taught to look upon as a formal old fellow unworthy the possession of so charming a creature. She had been instructed by the Renegado how to manage herself upon his arrival; so that she received him with an appearance of the utmost love and gratitude, and at length persuaded him to trust their common friend the Renegado with the money he had brought over for their ransom; as not questioning but he would beat down the terms of it, and negotiate the affair more to their advantage than they themselves could do. The good man admired her prudence, and followed her advice. I wish I could conceal the sequel of this story, but since I cannot I shall dispatch it in as few words as possible. The Castilian having slept longer than ordinary the next morning, upon his awaking found his wife had left him: He immediately rose and inquired after her, but was told that she was seen with the Renegado about break of day. In a word, her Lover having got all things ready for their departure, they soon made their escape out of the territories of Algiers, carried away the money, and left the Castilian in captivity; who partly through the cruel treatment of the incensed Algerine his master, and partly through the unkind usage of his unfaithful wife, died some few months after. L

N^o 199 Thursday, October 18.

—Scribere jussit amor.

Ovid. Ep. 4. v. 10.

Love bid me write.

THE following Letters are written with such an air of sincerity, that I cannot deny the inserting of them.

Mr.

MR. SPECTATOR,

‘ THough you are every where in your ‘ writings a friend to women, I do not ‘ remember that you have directly considered the ‘ mercenary practice of men in the choice of ‘ wives. If you would please to employ your ‘ thoughts upon that subject, you would easily ‘ conceive the miserable condition many of us ‘ are in, who not only from the laws of custom ‘ and modesty are restrained from making any ‘ advances towards our wishes, but are also,
‘ from the circumstance of fortune, out of all ‘ hope of being addressed to by those whom ‘ we love. Under all these disadvantages I am ‘ obliged to apply myself to you, and hope I ‘ shall prevail with you to print in your very ‘ next Paper the following Letter, which is a ‘ declaration of passion to one who has made ‘ some faint addresses to me for some time.
‘ I believe he ardently loves me, but the in‘ equality of my fortune makes him think he ‘ cannot answer it to the world, if he pursues ‘ his designs by way of marriage; and I believe, ‘ as he does not want discerning, he discovered ‘ me looking at him the other day unawares in ‘ such a manner as has raised his hopes of gain‘ ing me on terms the men call easier. But my ‘ heart was very full on this occasion, and if ‘ you know what love and honour are, you will ‘ pardon me that I use no farther arguments ‘ with you, but hasten to my letter to him, ‘ whom I call Oroondates, because if I do not ‘ succeed,

‘ succeed, it shall look like Romance; and if I ‘ am regarded, you shall receive a pair of gloves ‘ at my wedding, sent you under the name of ‘ Statira.’

TO OROONDATE.

S I R,

‘ AFTER very much perplexity in myself, and ‘ revolving how to acquaint you with my ‘ own sentiments, and expostulate with you ‘ concerning yours, I have chosen this way, ‘ by which means I can be at once revealed to ‘ you, or, if you please, lie concealed. If I ‘ do not within few days find the effect which ‘ I hope from this, the whole affair shall be ‘ buried in oblivion. But, alas! what am I ‘ going to do, when I am about to tell you that ‘ I love you? But after I have done so, I am ‘ to assure you, that with all the passion which ‘ ever entered a tender heart, I know I can ‘ banish you from my sight for ever, when I ‘ am convinced that you have no inclinations ‘ towards me but to my dishonour. But, alas!
 ‘ Sir, why should you sacrifice the real and ‘ essential happiness of life, to the opinion of a ‘ world, that moves upon no other foundation ‘ but professed error and prejudice? You all ‘ can observe that riches alone do not make ‘ you happy, and yet give up every thing else
 ‘ when it stands in competition with riches.
 ‘ Since the world is so bad, that religion is left ‘ to us silly women, and you men act gene‘ rally

‘ rally upon principles of profit and pleasure, ‘ I will talk to you without arguing from any ‘ thing but what may be most to your advantage, as a man of the world. And I will ‘ lay before you the state of the case, supposing ‘ that you had it in your power to make me ‘ your mistress, or your wife, and hope to convince you that the latter is more for your interest, and will contribute more to your pleasure.

‘ We will suppose then the scene was laid,
‘ and you were now in expectation of the approaching evening wherein I was to meet you, and be carried to what convenient corner of the town you thought fit, to consummate all which your wanton imagination has promised you in the possession of one who is in the bloom of youth, and in the reputation of innocence :
‘ You would soon have enough of me, as I am sprightly, young, gay, and airy. When fancy is sated, and finds all the promises it made itself false, where is now the innocence which charmed you ? The first hour you are alone you will find that the pleasure of a debauchée is only that of a destroyer : He blasts all the fruit he tastes, and where the brute has been devouring, there is nothing left worthy the relish of the man. Reason resumes her place after imagination is cloyed ; and I am, with the utmost distress and confusion, to behold myself the cause of uneasy reflexions to you, to be visited by stealth, and dwell for the future with the two companions
‘ (the

(the most unfit for each other in the world) solitude and guilt. I will not insist upon the shameful obscurity we should pass our time in, nor run over the little short snatches of fresh air, and free commerce which all people must be satisfied with, whose actions will not bear examination, but leave them to your reflexions, who have seen of that life, of which I have but a mere idea.

On the other hand, if you can be so good and generous as to make me your wife, you may promise yourself all the obedience and tenderness with which gratitude can inspire a virtuous woman. Whatever gratifications you may promise yourself from an agreeable person, whatever compliances from an easy temper, whatever consolations from a sincere friendship, you may expect as the due of your generosity. What at present in your ill view you promise yourself from me, will be followed by distaste and satiety; but the transports of a virtuous love are the least part of its happiness. The raptures of innocent passion are but like lightening to the day, they rather interrupt than advance the pleasure of it. How happy then is that life to be, where the highest pleasures of sense are but the lowest parts of its felicity!

Now am I to repeat to you the unnatural request of taking me in direct terms. I know there stands between me and that happiness, the haughty daughter of a man who can give you suitably to your fortune. But if you weigh
the

‘ the attendance and behaviour of her who ‘ comes to you in partnership of your fortune,
‘ and expects an equivalent, with that of her ‘ who enters your house as honoured and obliged ‘ by that permission, whom of the two will ‘ you choose? You, perhaps, will think fit to ‘ spend a day abroad in the common enter‘ tainments of men of sense and fortune; she ‘ will think herself ill used in that absence, and ‘ contrive at home an expence proportioned to ‘ the appearance which you make in the world.
‘ She is in all things to have a regard to the ‘ fortune which she brought you, I to the for‘ tune to which you introduced me. The com‘ merce between you two will eternally have ‘ the air of a bargain, between us of a friend‘ ship: Joy will ever enter into the room with ‘ you, and kind wishes attend my benefactor ‘ when he leaves it. Ask yourself, how would ‘ you be pleased to enjoy for ever the pleasure ‘ of having laid an immediate obligation on a ‘ grateful mind? such will be your case with me.
‘ In the other marriage you will live in a con‘ stant comparison of benefits, and never know ‘ the happiness of conferring or receiving any.

‘ It may be you will, after all, act rather in ‘ the prudential way, according to the sense ‘ of the ordinary world. I know not what I ‘ think or say, when that melancholy reflexion ‘ comes upon me; but shall only add more, ‘ that it is in your power to make me your ‘ grateful wife, but never your abandoned ‘ mistress.

T

Friday,

N^o 200 Friday, October 19.

Vincit amor patriæ.—— Virg. Æn. 6. v. 823.

The noblest motive is the public good.

THE ambition of Princes is many times as hurtful to themselves as to their people. This cannot be doubted of such as prove unfortunate in their wars, but it is often true too of those who are celebrated for their successes. If a severe view were to be taken of their conduct, if the profit and loss by their wars could be justly balanced, it would be rarely found that the conquest is sufficient to repay the cost.

As I was the other day looking over the letters of my correspondents, I took this hint from that of Pbilarithmus; which has turned my present thoughts upon political arithmetic, an art of greater use than entertainment. My friend has offered an essay towards proving that Lewis the Fourteenth, with all his acquisitions is not master of more people than at the beginning of his wars, nay that for every subject he had acquired, he had lost three that were his inheritance: If Pbilarithmus is not mistaken in his calculations, Lewis must have been impoverished by his ambition.

The Prince for the public good has a sovereign property in every private person's estate, and con-

consequently his riches must increase or decrease in proportion to the number and riches of his subjects. For example: If sword or pestilence should destroy all the people of this metropolis, (God forbid there should be room for such a supposition! but if this should be the case) the Queen must needs lose a great part of her revenue, or, at least, what is charged upon the City must increase the burden upon the rest of her subjects. Perhaps the inhabitants here are not above a tenth part of the whole; yet as they are better fed, and clothed, and lodged, than her other subjects, the customs and excises upon their consumption, the imposts upon their houses, and other taxes, do very probably make a fifth part of the whole revenue of the crown. But this is not all; the consumption of the City takes off a great part of the fruits of the whole island; and as it pays such a proportion of the rent or yearly value of the lands in the country, so it is the cause of paying such a proportion of taxes upon those lands. The loss then of such a people must needs be sensible to the Prince, and visible to the whole kingdom.

On the other hand, if it should please God to drop from heaven a new people equal in number and riches to the City, I should be ready to think their excises, customs, and house-rent would raise as great a revenue to the crown as would be lost in the former case. And as the consumption of this new body will be a new market for the fruits of the country, all the lands, especially those most adjacent, would rise in their yearly value, and pay greater yearly taxes to the public. The gain in this case would be as sensible as the former loss.
in

Whatsoever is assessed upon the general, is levied upon individuals. It were worth the while then to consider what is paid by, or by means of, the meanest subjects, in order to compute the value of every subject to the Prince.

For my own part, I should believe that seven eighths of the people are without property in themselves or the heads of their families, and forced to work for their daily bread; and that of this sort there are seven millions in the whole island of Great Britain: And yet one would imagine that seven eighths of the whole people should consume at least three fourths of the whole fruits of the country. If this is the case, the subjects without property pay three fourths of the rents, and consequently enable the landed men to pay three fourths of their taxes. Now if so great a part of the land-tax were to be divided by seven millions, it would amount to more than three shillings to every head. And thus as the poor are the cause, without which the rich could not pay this tax, even the poorest subject is upon this account worth three shillings yearly to the Prince.

Again: One would imagine the consumption of seven eighths of the whole people, should pay two thirds of all the customs and excises. And if this sum too should be divided by seven millions, viz. the number of poor people, it would amount to more than seven shillings to every head:

head: And therefore with this and the former sum every poor subject, without property, except of his limbs or labour, is worth at least ten shillings yearly to the Sovereign. So much then the Queen loses with every one of her old, and gains with every one of her new subjects.

When I was got into this way of thinking, I presently grew conceited of the argument, and was just preparing to write a letter of advice to a Member of Parliament, for opening the freedom of our towns and trades, for taking away all manner of distinctions between the natives and foreigners, for repealing our laws of parish settlements, and removing every other obstacle to the increase of the people. But as soon as I had recollected with what inimitable eloquence my fellow labourers had exaggerated the mischiefs of selling the birth-right of Britons for a shilling, of spoiling the pure British blood with foreign mixtures, of introducing a confusion of languages and religions, and of letting in strangers to eat the bread out of the mouths of our own people, I became so humble as to let my project fall to the ground, and leave my country to increase by the ordinary way of generation.

As I have always at heart the public good, so I am ever contriving schemes to promote it; and I think I may without vanity pretend to have contrived some as wise as any of the castle-builders. I had no sooner given up my former project, but my head was presently full of draining fens and marshes, banking out the sea, and joining new lands to my country; for since it is thought impracticable to increase the people to the land, I fell immediately to consider how much would be gained to the Prince by increasing the land to the people.

If the same omnipotent Power, which made the world, should at this time raise out of the ocean and join to Great Britain an equal extent of land, with equal buildings, corn, cattle and other conveniences and necessaries of life, but no men, women, nor children, I should hardly believe this would add either to the riches of the People, or revenue of the Prince; for since the present buildings are sufficient for all the inhabitants, if any of them should forsake the old to inhabit the new part of the island, the increase of house-rent in this would be attended with at least an equal decrease of it in the other: Besides, we have such a sufficiency of corn and cattle, that we give bounties to our neighbours to take what exceeds of the former off our hands, and we will not suffer any of the latter to be imported upon us by our fellow-subjects; and for the remaining product of the country it is already equal to all our markets. But if all these things should be doubled to the same buyers, the owners must be glad with half their present prices, the landlords with half their present rents; and thus by so great an enlargement of the country, the rents in the whole would not increase, nor the taxes to the public.

On the contrary, I should believe they would be very much diminished; for as the land is only valuable for its fruits, and these are all perish-perishable, and for the most part must either be used within the year, or perish without use, the owners will get rid of them at any rate, rather than they should waste in their possession : So that it is probable the annual production of those perishable things, even of one tenth part of them, beyond all possibility of use, will reduce one half of their value. It seems to be for this reason that our neighbour merchants who ingross all the spices, and know how great a quantity is equal to the demand, destroy all that exceeds it. It were natural then to think that the annual production of twice as much as can be used, must reduce all to an eighth part of their present prices ; and thus this extended island would not exceed one fourth part of its present value, or pay more than one fourth part of the present tax.

It is generally observed, that in countries of the greatest plenty there is the poorest living ; like the schoolmens as in one of my Speculations, the people almost starve between two meals. The truth is, the poor, which are the bulk of a nation, work only that they may live ; and if with two days labour they can get a wretched subsistence, they will hardly be brought to work the other four : But then with the wages of two days they can neither pay such prices for their provisions, nor such excises to the government.

That paradox therefore in old Hesiod ἡμισὺ πλεονέστερον, or half is more than the whole, is very applicable to the present case ; since nothing is more true in political arithmetic, than that the same people with half the country is more valuable than with the whole. I begin to think there was nothing absurd in Sir W. Petty, when he fancied if all the highlands of Scotland and the whole kingdom of Ireland were sunk in the ocean, so that the people were all saved and brought into the lowlands of Great Britain; nay, though they were to be reimburs'd the value of their estates by the body of the people, yet both the Sovereign and the Subjects in general would be enriched by the very loss.

If the people only make the riches, the father of ten children is a greater benefactor to his country, than he who has added to it ten thousand acres of land and no people. It is certain Lewis has joined vast tracts of land to his dominions: But if Philarithmus says true, that he is not now master of so many subjects as before; we may then account for his not being able to bring such mighty armies into the field, and for their being neither so well fed, nor clothed, nor paid as formerly. The reason is plain, Lewis must needs have been impoverished not only by his loss of subjects, but by his acquisition of lands.

T

N^o 201 Saturday, October 20.

Religentem esse oportet, religiosum nefas.

Incerti Autoris apud Aul. Gell.

A man should be religious, not superstitious.

IT is of the last importance to season the passions of a child with Devotion, which seldom dies in a mind that has received an early tincture of it. Though it may seem extinguished for a while by the cares of the world, the heats of youth, or the allurements of vice, it generally breaks out and discovers itself again as soon as discretion, consideration, age, or misfortunes have brought the man to himself. The fire may be covered and overlaid, but cannot be intirely quenched and smothered.

A state of temperance, sobriety, and justice, without Devotion, is a cold, lifeless, insipid condition of virtue; and is rather to be stiled philosophy than religion. Devotion opens the mind to great conceptions, and fills it with more sublime ideas than any that are to be met with in the most exalted science; and at the same time warms and agitates the soul more than sensual pleasure.

It has been observed by some writers, that man is more distinguished from the animal world by Devotion than by Reason, as several brute creatures discover in their actions something like a faint glimmering of reason, though they betray in no single circumstance of their behaviour any thing that bears the least affinity to Devotion. It is certain, the propensity of the mind to religious worship, the natural tendency of the soul to fly to some superior Being for succour in dangers and distresses, the gratitude to an invisible Superintendent which arises in us upon receiving any extraordinary and unexpected good fortune, the acts of love and admiration with which the thoughts of men are so wonderfully transported in meditating upon the divine perfections, and the universal concurrence of all the nations under heaven in the great article of adoration, plainly shew that Devotion or religious worship must be the effect of tradition from some first founder of mankind, or that it is conformable to the natural light of reason, or that it proceeds from instinct implanted in the Soul itself. For my part, I look upon all these to be the concurrent causes: But which ever of them shall be assigned as the principle of divine worship, it manifestly points to a supreme Being as the first author of it.

I may take some other opportunity of considering those particular forms and methods of Devotion which are taught us by Christianity; but shall here observe into what errors even this divine principle may sometimes lead us, when it is not moderated by that right reason

reason which was given us as the guide of all our actions.

The two great errors into which a mistaken Devotion may betray us, are enthusiasm and superstition.

There is not a more melancholy object than a man who has his head turned with religious enthusiasm. A person that is crazed, though with pride or malice, is a sight very mortifying to human nature; but when the distemper arises from any indiscreet fervours of Devotion, or too intense an application of the mind to its mistaken duties, it deserves our compassion in a more particular manner. We may however learn this lesson from it, that since Devotion itself (which one would be apt to think could not be too warm) may disorder the mind, unless its heats are tempered with caution and prudence, we should be particularly careful to keep our reason as cool as possible, and to guard ourselves in all parts of life against the influence of passion, imagination, and constitution.

Devotion, when it does not lie under the check of reason, is very apt to degenerate into enthusiasm. When the mind finds herself very much inflamed with her Devotions, she is too much inclined to think they are not of her own kindling, but blown up by something divine within her. If she indulges this thought too far, and humours the growing passion, she at last flings herself into imaginary raptures and ecstasies; and when once she fancies herself under the influence of a divine impulse, it is no wonder if she flights human ordinances, and refuses to comply with any established form of religion, as thinking herself directed by a much superior guide.

As enthusiasm is a kind of excess in Devotion, superstition is the excess not only of Devotion, but of religion in general, according to an old heathen saying, quoted by Aulus Gellius, Religentem esse oportet, religiosum nefas; A man should be religious, not superstitious; for as the author tells us, Nigidius observed upon this passage, that the Latin words which terminate in osus generally imply vicious characters, and the having of any quality to an excess.

An enthusiast in religion is like an obstinate clown, a superstitious man like an insipid Courtier. Enthusiasm has something in it of madness, superstition of folly. Most of the sects that fall short of the church of England have in them strong tinctures of enthusiasm, as the Roman-catholic religion is one huge over-grown body of childish and idle superstitions.

The Roman-catholic church seems indeed irrecoverably lost in this particular. If an absurd dress or behaviour be introduced in the world, it will soon be found out and discarded: On the contrary, a habit or ceremony, though never so ridiculous, which has taken sanctuary in the church, sticks in it for ever. A Gothic bishop, perhaps, thought it proper to repeat such a form in such particular shoes or slippers; another fancied it would be very decent if such a part

a part of public Devotions were performed with a mitre on his head, and a crozier in his hand: To this a brother Vandal, as wise as the others, adds an antic dress, which he conceived would allude very aptly to such and such mysteries, until by degrees the whole office has degenerated into an empty show.

Their successors see the vanity and inconvenience of these ceremonies; but instead of reforming, perhaps add others, which they think more significant, and which take possession in the same manner, and are never to be driven out after they have been once admitted. I have seen the Pope officiate at St. Peter's, where, for two hours together, he was busied in putting on or off his different accoutrements, according to the different parts he was to act in them.

Nothing is so glorious in the eyes of mankind, and ornamental to human nature, setting aside the infinite advantages which arise from it, as a strong, steady, masculine piety; but enthusiasm and superstition are the weaknesses of human reason, that expose us to the scorn and derision of infidels, and sink us even below the beasts that perish.

Idolatry may be looked upon as another error arising from mistaken Devotion; but because reflexions on that subject would be of no use to an English reader, I shall not enlarge upon it.

L

N^o 202 Monday, October 22.

Sæpe decem vitiis instructior odit & horret.

Hor. Ep. 18. l. 1. v. 25.

Many, though faultier much themselves, pretend
Their less offending neighbours faults to mend.

THE other day as I passed along the street, I saw a sturdy 'prentice-boy disputing with an hackney-coachman; and in an instant, upon some word of provocation, throw off his hat and periwig, clench his fist, and strike the fellow a slap on the face; at the same time calling him rascal, and telling him he was a Gentleman's son. The young Gentleman was, it seems, bound to a Blacksmith; and the debate arose about payment for some work done about a coach, near which they fought. His master, during the combat, was full of his boy's praises; and as he called to him to play with his hand and foot, and throw in his head, he made all us who stood round him of his party, by declaring the boy had very good friends, and he could trust him with untold gold. As I am generally in the theory of mankind, I could not but make my reflexions upon the sudden popularity which was raised about the lad; and perhaps, with my friend Tacitus, fell into observations upon it, which were too great for the occasion; occasion; or ascribed this general favour to causes which had nothing to do towards it. But the young Blacksmith's being a Gentleman was, methought, what created him good-will from his present equality with the mob about him: Add to this, that he was not so much a Gentleman, as not, at the same time that he called himself such, to use as rough methods for his defence as his antagonist. The advantage of his having good friends, as his master expressed it, was not lazily urged; but he shewed himself superior to the coachman in the personal qualities of courage and activity, to confirm that of his being well allied, before his birth was of any service to him.

If one might moralize from this silly story, a man would say, that whatever advantages of fortune, birth, or any other good, people possess above the rest of the world, they should shew collateral eminences besides those distinctions; or those distinctions will avail only to keep up common decencies and ceremonies, and not to preserve a real place of favour or esteem in the opinion and common sense of their fellow-creatures.

The folly of people's procedure, in imagining that nothing more is necessary than property and superior circumstances to support them in distinction, appears in no way so much as in the domestic part of life. It is ordinary to feed their humours into unnatural excrescences, if I may so speak, and make their whole Being a wayward and uneasy condition, for want of the obvious reflexion that all parts of human life is a commerce. It is not only paying wages, and giving commands, that constitutes a master of a family; but prudence, equal behaviour, with readiness to protect and cherish them, is what entitles a man to that character in their very hearts and sentiments. It is pleasant enough to observe, that men expect from their dependents, from their sole motive of fear, all the good effects which a liberal education, and affluent fortune, and every other advantage, cannot produce in themselves. A man will have his servant just, diligent, sober and chaste, for no other reasons but the terror of losing his master's favour; when all the laws divine and human cannot keep him whom he serves within bounds, with relation to any one of those virtues. But both in great and ordinary affairs, all superiority, which is not founded on merit and virtue, is supported only by artifice and stratagem. Thus you see flatterers are the agents in families of humourists, and those who govern themselves by any thing but reason. Make-bates, distant relations, poor kinsmen, and indigent followers, are the fry which support the oeconomy of an humourfom rich man. He is eternally whispered with intelligence of who are true and false to him in matters of no consequence, and he maintains twenty friends to defend him against the insinuations of one who would perhaps cheat him of an old coat.

I shall not enter into farther speculation upon this subject at present, but think the following

Letters

Letters and Petition are made up of proper sentiments on this occasion.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

I Am a servant to an old Lady who is governed by one she calls her friend; who is so familiar an one, that she takes upon her to advise her without being called to it, and makes her uneasy with all about her. Pray, Sir, be pleased to give us some remarks upon voluntary counsellors; and let these people know that to give any body advice, is to say to that person, I am your betters. Pray, Sir, as near as you can, describe that eternal flirt and disturber of families, Mrs. Taperty, who is always visiting, and putting people in a way, as they call it. If you can make her stay at home one evening, you will be a general benefactor to all the Ladies women in town, and particularly to

Your loving friend,

Susan Civil.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

I Am a footman, and live with one of those men, each of whom is said to be one of the best humoured men in the world, but that he is passionate. Pray be pleased to inform them, that he who is passionate, and takes no care to command his hastiness, does more injury to his friends and servants in one half hour, than whole years can atone for. This master of

' of mine, who is the best man alive in common
 ' fame, disoblige some body every day he lives;
 ' and strikes me for the next thing I do, because ' he is out of humour at it. If these Gentlemen
 ' knew that they do all the mischief that is ever ' done in conversation, they would reform; and ' I who have been a spectator of Gentlemen at ' dinner for many years, have seen that indis-
 ' cretion does ten times more mischief than ill-
 ' nature. But you will represent this better than

Your abused humble servant,

Thomas Smoky.

TO the SPECTATOR,

The humble Petition of John Steward, Robert Butler, Harry Cook, and Abigail Chambers, in behalf of themselves and their relations, belonging to and dispersed in the several services of most of the great families within the cities of London and Westminster,

Sheweth,

' THAT in many of the families in which
 ' your petitioners live and are employed,
 ' the several heads of them are wholly unac' quainted with what is business, and are very ' little judges when they are well or ill used by ' us your said petitioners.

' That for want of such skill in their own ' affairs, and by indulgence of their own laziness
 ' and pride, they continually keep about them
 ' certain mischievous animals called spies.

‘ That whenever a spy is entertained, the ‘ peace of that house is from that moment ‘ banished.

‘ That spies never give an account of good ‘ services, but represent our mirth and freedom ‘ by the words, Wantonneſs and Diſorder.

‘ That in all families where there are spies,
‘ there is a general jealousy and miſunder‘ ſtanding.

‘ That the maſters and miſtreſſes of ſuch ‘ houſes live in continual ſuſpicion of their in‘ genuous and true ſervants, and are given up ‘ to the management of thoſe who are falſe and ‘ perfidious.

‘ That ſuch maſters and miſtreſſes who enter‘ tain spies, are no longer more than cyphers in ‘ their own families; and that we your petitioners ‘ are with great diſdain obliged to pay all our ‘ reſpect, and expect all our maintenance from ‘ ſuch spies.

‘ Your petitioners therefore moſt humbly pray, ‘ that you would repreſent the premiſes to ‘ all perſons of condition; and your petiti‘ oners, as in duty bound, ſhall for ever ‘ pray, &c.

T

N^o 203 Tuesday, October 23.

*Phæbe pater, si das hujus mihi nominis usum,
Nec falsâ Clymene culpam sub imagine celat ; Pignora da, genitor—* Ovid. Met. l. 2. v. 36.

Illustrious parent ! since you don't despise
A parent's name, some certain token give,
That I may Clymene's proud boast believe,
Nor longer under false reproaches grieve.

ADDISON.

THERE is a loose tribe of men whom I have not yet taken notice of, that ramble into all the corners of this great city, in order to seduce such unfortunate females as fall into their walks. These abandoned profligates raise up issue in every quarter of the town, and very often, for a valuable consideration, father it upon the churchwarden. By this means there are several married men who have a little family in most of the parishes of London and Westminster, and several Bachelors who are undone by a charge of children.

When a man once gives himself this liberty of preying at large, and living upon the common, he finds so much game in a populous city, that it is surprising to consider the numbers which he sometimes propagates. We see many a young fellow who is scarce of age, that could lay his claim to the jus trium liberorum, or the privileges which were granted by the Roman laws to all such as were fathers of three children: Nay, I have heard a rake, who was not quite five and twenty, declare himself the father of a seventh son, and very prudently determine to breed him up a physician. In short, the town is full of these young patriarchs, not to mention several battered beaus, who, like heedless spendthrifts that squander away their estates before they are masters of them, have raised up their whole stock of children before marriage.

to

I must not here omit the particular whim of an impudent libertine that had a little smattering of heraldry; and observing how the genealogies of great families were often drawn up in the shape of trees, had taken a fancy to dispose of his own illegitimate issue in a figure of the same kind.

—Nec longum tempus & ingens Exiit ad cælum ramis felicibus arbos, Miraturque novas frondes, & non sua poma.

Virg. Georg. 2. v. 80.

And in short space the laden boughs arise,
With happy fruit advancing to the skies:
The mother plant admires the leaves unknown
Of alien trees, and apples not her own.

DRYDEN.

The trunk of the tree was marked with his own name, Will Maple. Out of the side of it grew a large barren branch, inscribed Mary Maple, the name of his unhappy wife. The head was adorned with five huge boughs. On the bottom of the first was written in capital characters Kate Cole, who branched out into three sprigs, viz. William, Richard, and Rebecca. Sal. Twisford gave birth to another bough that shot up into Sarah, Tom, Will, and Frank. The third arm of the tree had only a single infant on it, with a space left for a second, the parent from whom it sprung being near her time when the author took this ingenious device into his head. The two other great boughs were very plentifully loaden with fruit of the same kind; besides which there were many ornamental branches that did not bear. In short, a more flourishing tree never came out of the Heralds office.

What makes this generation of vermin so very prolific, is the indefatigable diligence with which they apply themselves to their business. A man does not undergo more watchings and fatigues in a campaign, than in the course of a vicious amour. As it is said of some men, that they make their business their pleasure, these sons of darkness may be said to make their pleasure their business. They might conquer their corrupt inclinations with half the pains they are at in gratifying them.

Nor is the invention of these men less to be admired than their industry and vigilance. There is a fragment of Apollodorus the comic Poet (who was contemporary with Menander) which is full of humour, as follows: 'Thou mayest shut up thy doors, says he, with bars and bolts: It will be impossible for the Blacksmith to make them so fast, but a cat and a whoremaster
' will

'will find a way through them.' In a word, there is no head so full of stratagems as that of a libidinous man.

Where I to propose a punishment for this infamous race of propagators, it should be to send them, after the second or third offence, into our American colonies, in order to people those parts of her Majesty's dominions where there is a want of inhabitants, and in the phrase of Diogenes, to 'plant men.' Some countries punish this crime with death; but I think such a banishment would be sufficient, and might turn this generative faculty to the advantage of the public.

In the mean time, until these Gentlemen may be thus disposed of, I would earnestly exhort them to take care of those unfortunate creatures whom they have brought into the world by these indirect methods, and to give their spurious children such an education as may render them more virtuous than their parents. This is the best atonement they can make for their own crimes, and indeed the only method that is left them to repair their past miscarriages.

I would likewise desire them to consider, whether they are not bound in common humanity, as well as by all the obligations of religion and nature, to make some provision for those whom they have not only given life to, but entailed upon them, though very unreasonably, a degree of shame and disgrace. And here I cannot but take notice of those depraved notions which prevail among us, and which must have taken rise from our natural inclination to favour a vice to which we are so very prone, namely, that Bastardy and Cuckoldom should be looked upon as reproaches, and that the ignominy, which is only due to lewdness and falsehood, should fall in so unreasonable a manner upon the persons who are innocent.

I have been insensibly drawn into this discourse by the following Letter, which is drawn up with such a spirit of sincerity, that I question not but the writer of it has represented his case in a true and genuine light.

S I R,

‘ I Am one of those people who by the general opinion of the world are counted both infamous and unhappy.

‘ My father is a very eminent man in this kingdom, and one who bears considerable offices in it. I am his son, but my misfortune is, that I dare not call him father, nor he without shame own me as his issue, I being illegitimate, and therefore deprived of that endearing tenderness and unparalleled satisfaction which a good man finds in the love and conversation of a parent: Neither have I the opportunities to render him the duties of a son, he having always carried himself at so vast a distance, and with such superiority towards me, that by long use I have contracted a timorousness when before him, which hinders me from declaring my own necessities, and ‘ giving

‘ giving him to understand the inconveniences I ‘ undergo.

‘ It is my misfortune to have been neither ‘ bred a Scholar, a Soldier, nor to any kind of ‘ business, which renders me intirely uncapable ‘ of making provision for myself without his ‘ assistance; and this creates a continual uneasi‘ ness in my mind, fearing I shall in time want ‘ bread; my father, if I may so call him, giving ‘ me but very faint assurances of doing any thing ‘ for me.

‘ I have hitherto lived somewhat like a Gen‘ tleman, and it would be very hard for me to ‘ labour for my living. I am in continual an‘ xiety for my future fortune, and under a great ‘ unhappiness in losing the sweet conversation ‘ and friendly advice of my parents; so that ‘ I cannot look upon myself otherwise than as ‘ a monster, strangely sprung up in nature, which ‘ every one is ashamed to own.

‘ I am thought to be a man of some natural ‘ parts, and by the continual reading what you ‘ have offered the world, become an admirer ‘ thereof, which has drawn me to make this ‘ confession; at the same time hoping, if any ‘ thing herein shall touch you with a sense of ‘ pity, you would then allow me the favour of ‘ your opinion thereupon; as also what part I, ‘ being unlawfully born, may claim of the ‘ man’s affection who begot me, and how far ‘ in your opinion I am to be thought his son;
‘ or he acknowledged as my father. Your sen' timents and advice herein will be a great con' solation and satisfaction to,

Sir,

your admirer and

humble servant,

C

W. B.

N^o 204 Wednesday, October 24,

Urit grata protervitas,

Et vultus nimium lubricus aspici.

Hor. Od. 19. l. 1. v. 7.

With winning coyness she my soul disarms :

Her face darts forth a thousand rays ;

My eye-balls swim, and I grow giddy while I gaze.

CONGREVE.

I AM not at all displeased that I am become the courier of Love, and that the distressed in that passion convey their complaints to each other by my means. The following Letters have lately come to my hands, and shall have their place with great willingness. As to the reader's entertainment, he will, I hope, forgive the inserting such particulars as to him may perhaps seem frivolous, but are to the persons who wrote them of the highest consequence. I shall not trouble you with the prefaces, compliments, and apologies made to me before each epistle when it was desired to be inserted ; but in general they tell me, that the persons to whom they are address'd have intimations, by phrases and allusions in them, from whence they came.

To the SOTHADES.

THE word, by which I address you, gives you, who understand Portuguese, a lively image of the tender regard I have for you. The SPECTATOR's late Letter from Statira gave me the hint to use the same method of explaining myself to you. I am not affronted at the design your late behaviour discovered you had in your addresses to me; but I impute it to the degeneracy of the age, rather than your particular fault. As I aim at nothing more than being yours, I am willing to be a stranger to your name, your fortune, or any figure which your wife might expect to make in the world, provided my commerce with you is not to be a guilty one. I resign gay dress, the pleasures of visits, equipage, plays, balls, and operas, for that one satisfaction of having you for ever mine. I am willing you shall industriously conceal the only cause of triumph which I can know in this life. I wish only to have it my duty, as well as my inclination, to study your happiness. If this has not the effect this Letter seems to aim at, you are to understand that I had a mind to be rid of you, and took the readiest way to pall you with an offer of what you would never desist pursuing while you received ill usage. Be a true ‘ true man ; be my slave while you doubt me,

O 4

 ‘ and neglect me when you think I love you.
 ‘ I defy you to find out what is your present ‘ circumstance with me ; but I know while I ‘ can keep this suspense,

I am your admired

Belinda.

MADAM,

‘ IT is a strange state of mind a man is in,
 ‘ when the very imperfections of a woman
 ‘ he loves turn into excellencies and advantages.
 ‘ I do assure you, I am very much afraid of ‘ venturing upon you. I now like you in spite ‘ of my reason, and think it an ill circumstance ‘ to owe one’s happiness to nothing but infatu‘ ation. I can see you ogle all the young fellows ‘ who look at you, and observe your eye wander ‘ after new conquests every moment you are in ‘ a public place ; and yet there is such a beauty ‘ in all your looks and gestures, that I cannot ‘ but admire you in the very act of endeavour‘ ing to gain the hearts of others. My condition ‘ is the same with that of the Lover in the Way ‘ of the World. I have studied your faults so ‘ long, that they are become as familiar to me,
 ‘ and I like them as well as I do my own.
 ‘ Look to it, Madam, and consider whether ‘ you think this gay behaviour will appear to ‘ me as amiable when an Husband, as it does ‘ now to me a Lover. Things are so far ad‘ vanced, that we must proceed ; and I hope ‘ you will lay it to heart, that it will be becoming in me to appear still your Lover, but not in you to be still my Mistress. Gaiety in the matrimonial life is graceful in one Sex, but exceptionable in the other. As you improve these little hints, you will ascertain the happiness or uneasiness of, Madam,

Your most obedient,

most humble servant,

T. D.

S I R,

WHEN I sat at the window, and you at the other end of the room by my cousin, I saw you catch me looking at you. Since you have the secret at last, which I am sure you should never have known but by inad-vertency, what my eyes said was true. But it is too soon to confirm it with my hand, therefore shall not subscribe my name.

S I R,

THERE were other Gentlemen nearer, and I know no necessity you were under to take up that flippant creature's fan last night; but you shall never touch a stick of mine more, that's pos.

Phillis.

To Colonel R—— in Spain.

BEFORE this can reach the best of Husbands and the fondest Lover, those tender names will be no more of concern to me. The indisposition in which you, to obey the dictates
 of

‘ of your honour and duty, left me, has increased ‘ upon me; and I am acquainted by my phyfi‘ cians I cannot live a week longer. At this ‘ time my spirits fail me; and it is the ardent ‘ love I have for you that carries me beyond my ‘ strength, and enables me to tell you, the most ‘ painful thing in the prospect of death, is, that ‘ I must part with you. But let it be a comfort ‘ to you, that I have no guilt hangs upon me,
‘ no unrepented folly that retards me; but I ‘ pass away my last hours in reflexion upon the ‘ happiness we have lived in together, and in ‘ sorrow that it is so soon to have an end. This ‘ is a frailty which I hope is so far from criminal, ‘ that methinks there is a kind of piety in being ‘ so unwilling to be separated from a state which ‘ is the institution of Heaven, and in which we ‘ have lived according to its laws. As we know ‘ no more of the next life, but that it will be an ‘ happy one to the good, and miserable to the ‘ wicked, why may we not please ourselves at ‘ least, to alleviate the difficulty of resigning ‘ this Being, in imagining that we shall have ‘ a sense of what passes below, and may pos‘ sibly be employed in guiding the steps of those ‘ with whom we walked with innocence when ‘ mortal? Why may not I hope to go on in ‘ my usual work, and, though unknown to ‘ you, be assistant in all the conflicts of your ‘ mind? Give me leave to say to you, O ‘ best of men, that I cannot figure to my‘ self a greater happiness than in such an em‘ ployment: To be present at all the adven‘ tures

'tures to which human life is exposed, to ad'minister slumber to thy eyelids in the agonies
 'of a fever, to cover thy beloved face in the 'day of battle, to go with thee a guardian
 'Angel incapable of wound or pain, where
 'I have longed to attend thee when a weak,
 'a fearful woman : These, my Dear, are the 'thoughts with which I warm my poor languid
 'heart ; but indeed I am not capable under 'my present weakness of bearing the strong
 'agonies of mind I fall into, when I form to 'myself the grief you will be in upon your 'first hearing of my departure. I will not dwell
 'upon this, because your kind and generous 'heart will be but the more afflicted, the more
 'the person for whom you lament offers you
 'consolation. My last breath will, if I am 'myself, expire in a prayer for you. I shall 'never see thy face again. Farewel for ever. T

N^o 205 Thursday, October 25.

Decipimur specie recti — Hor. Ars. Poet. v. 25.

Deluded by a seeming excellence. ROSCOMMON.

WHEN I meet with any vicious character that is not generally known, in order to prevent its doing mischief, I draw it at length, and set it up as a Scare-crow ; by which

which means I do not only make an example of the person to whom it belongs, but give warning to all her Majesty's subjects, that they may not suffer by it. Thus, to change the allusion, I have marked out several of the shoals and quicksands of life, and am continually employed in discovering those which are still concealed, in order to keep the ignorant and unwary from running upon them. It is with this intention that I publish the following Letter, which brings to light some secrets of this nature.

MR. SPECTATOR,

THERE are none of your Speculations which I read over with greater delight, than those which are designed for the improvement of our Sex. You have endeavoured to correct our unreasonable fears and superstitions, in your seventh and twelfth Papers; our fancy for Equipage, in your fifteenth; our love of Puppet-shows, in your thirty-first; our notions of Beauty, in your thirty-third; our inclination for Romances, in your thirty-seventh; our passion for French Fopperies, in your forty-fifth; our manhood and Party-zeal, in your fifty-seventh; our abuse of Dancing, in your sixty-sixth, and sixty-seventh; our Levity, in your hundred and twenty-eighth; our love of Coxcombs, in your hundred and fifty-fourth, and hundred and fifty-seventh; our tyranny over the Henpeckt, in your hundred and seventy-sixth. You have described
the

the Pist in your forty-first; the Idol, in your seventy-third; the Demurrer, in your eighty-ninth; the Salamander, in your hundred and ninety-eighth. You have likewise taken to pieces our Dress, and represented to us the extravagances we are often guilty of in that particular. You have fallen upon our Patches, in you fiftieth and eighty-first; our Com-modes, in your ninety-eighth; our Fans, in your hundred and second; our Riding-habits, in your hundred and fourth; our Hoop-petticoats, in your hundred and twenty-seventh; besides a great many little Blemishes which you have touched upon in your several other Papers, and in those many Letters that are scattered up and down your works. At the same time we must own, that the compliments you pay our Sex are innumerable, and that those very faults which you represent in us, are neither black in themselves, nor, as you own, universal among us. But, Sir, it is plain that these your discourses are calculated for none but the fashionable part of woman-kind, and for the use of those who are rather indiscreet than vicious. But, Sir, there is a sort of Prostitutes in the lower part of our Sex, who are a scandal to us, and very well deserve to fall under your censure. I know it would debase your Paper too much to enter into the behaviour of these female libertines; but as your remarks on some part of it would be a doing of justice to several women of virtue and honour, whose reputations

‘ tions suffer by it, I hope you will not think ‘ it improper to give the public some accounts
‘ of this nature. You must know, Sir, I am ‘ provoked to write you this letter by the ‘ behaviour of an infamous woman, who having ‘ passed her youth in a most shameful state of ‘ prostitution, is now one of those who gain their ‘ livelihood by seducing others, that are younger ‘ than themselves, and by establishing a criminal ‘ commerce between the two sexes. Among ‘ several of her artifices to get money, she frequently ‘ persuades a vain young fellow, that ‘ such a woman of Quality, or such a celebrated ‘ Toast, entertains a secret passion for ‘ him, and wants nothing but an opportunity ‘ of revealing it: Nay, she has gone so far as ‘ to write letters in the name of a woman of ‘ figure, to borrow money of one of these ‘ foolish Roderigo’s, which she has afterwards ‘ appropriated to her own use. In the mean ‘ time, the person who has lent the money,
‘ has thought a Lady under obligations to him, ‘ who scarce knew his name; and wondered at ‘ her ingratitude when he has been with her, ‘ that she has not owned the favour, though at ‘ the same time he was too much a man of ‘ honour to put her in mind of it.

‘ When this abandoned baggage meets with ‘ a man who has vanity enough to give credit ‘ to relations of this nature, she turns him to ‘ very good account, by repeating praises that ‘ were never uttered, and delivering messages ‘ that were never sent. As the house
‘ of

‘ of this shameless creature is frequented by ‘ several Foreigners, I have heard of another ‘ artifice, out of which she often raises money.
‘ The Foreigner sighs after some British Beauty, ‘ whom he only knows by fame: Upon which ‘ she promises, if he can be secret, to procure ‘ him a meeting. The stranger, ravished at his ‘ good fortune, gives her a present, and in a ‘ little time is introduced to some imaginary ‘ Title; for you must know that this cunning ‘ purveyor has her representatives, upon this ‘ occasion, of some of the finest Ladies in the ‘ kingdom. By this means, as I am informed, ‘ it is usual enough to meet with a German ‘ Count in foreign countries, that shall make ‘ his boasts of favours he has received from ‘ women of the highest ranks, and the most ‘ unblemished characters. Now, Sir, what safety ‘ is there for a woman’s reputation, when a ‘ Lady may be thus prostituted as it were by ‘ proxy; and be reputed an unchaste woman;
‘ as the Hero in the ninth book of Dryden’s ‘ Virgil is looked upon as a coward, because ‘ the phantom which appeared in his likeness ‘ ran away from Turnus? You may depend ‘ upon what I relate to you to be matter of fact,
‘ and the practice of more than one of these ‘ female Pandars. If you print this letter, I ‘ may give you some farther accounts of this ‘ vicious race of women.

Your humble servant,

BELVIDERA.

I shall

I shall add two other Letters on different Subjects to fill up my Paper.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

I Am a country Clergyman, and hope you will lend me your assistance in ridiculing some little indecencies which cannot so properly be exposed from the pulpit.

A widow Lady, who straggled this summer from London into my parish for the benefit of the air, as she says, appears every Sunday at Church with many fashionable extravagancies, to the great astonishment of my congregation.

But what gives us the most offence is her theatrical manner of singing the psalms. She introduces above fifty Italian airs into the hundredth psalm, and whilst we begin All people in the old solemn tune of our forefathers, she in a quite different key runs divisions on the vowels, and adorns them with the graces of Nicolini; if she meets with eke or aye, which are frequent in the metre of Hopkins and Sternhold, we are certain to hear her quavering them half a minute after us to some sprightly airs of the Opera.

I am very far from being an enemy to church-music; but fear this abuse of it may make my parish ridiculous, who already look on the singing-psalms as an entertainment, and not part of their devotion: Besides, I am apprehensive that the infection may spread, for I quire Squeekum, who by his voice seems (if I may

' may use the expression) to be cut out for
' an Italian finger, was last Sunday practising
' the same airs.

' I know the Lady's principles, and that she ' will plead the Toleration, which (as she fan' cies) allows her non-conformity in this par' ticular; but I beg you to acquaint her, that ' singing the psalms in a different tune from ' the rest of the congregation, is a sort of ' schism not tolerated by that act.

I am, Sir,

Your very humble servant,

R. S.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

' I N your Paper upon Temperance, you pre-
' scribe to us a rule of drinking out of ' Sir William Temple, in the following words;
' " the first glass for myself, the second for my ' " friends, the third for good-humour, and the ' " fourth for mine enemies." Now, Sir, you ' must know, that I have read this your Spec' tator, in a club whereof I am a member;
' when our President told us, there was cer' tainly an error in the Print, and that the word
' glass should be bottle; and therefore has or' dered me to inform you of this mistake, and
' to desire you to publish the following erratum:
' In the Paper of Saturday, October 13, col. 3,
' line 11, for glass read bottle.

L

Yours, Robin Good-fellow.

N^o 206 Friday, October 26.

Quanto quisque sibi plura negaverit,

A Diis plura feret ——— Hor. Od. 16. l. 3. v. 21.

They that do much themselves deny,
Receive more blessings from the sky. CREECH.

THERE is a call upon mankind to value and esteem those who set a moderate price upon their own merit; and self-denial is frequently attended with unexpected blessings, which in the end abundantly recompense such losses as the modest seem to suffer in the ordinary occurrences of life. The curious tell us, a determination in our favour or to our disadvantage is made upon our first appearance, even before they know any thing of our characters, but from the intimations men gather from our aspect. A man, they say, wears the picture of his mind in his countenance; and one man's eyes are spectacles to his who looks at him to read his heart. But though that way of raising an opinion of those we behold in public is very fallacious, certain it is, that those, who by their words and actions take as much upon themselves, as they can but barely demand in the strict scrutiny of their deserts, will find their account lessen every day. A modest man preserves his character, as a frugal man does his fortune; if either of them

live

live to the height of either, one will find losses, the other errors, which he has not stock by him to make up. It were therefore a just rule, to keep your desires, your words and actions, within the regard you observe your friends have for you; and never, if it were in a man's power, to take as much as he possibly might either in preferment or reputation. My walks have lately been among the mercantile part of the world; and one gets phrases naturally from those with whom one converses: I say then, he that in his air, his treatment of others, or an habitual arrogance to himself, gives himself credit for the least article of more wit, wisdom, goodness, or valour than he can possibly produce if he is called upon, will find the world break in upon him, and consider him as one who has cheated them of all the esteem they had before allowed him. This brings a commission of bankruptcy upon him; and he that might have gone on to his life's end in a prosperous way, by aiming at more than he should, is no longer proprietor of what he really had before, but his pretensions fare as all things do which are torn instead of being divided.

There is no one living would deny Cinna the applause of an agreeable and facetious wit; or could possibly pretend that there is not something inimitably unforced and diverting in his manner of delivering all his sentiments in his conversation, if he were able to conceal the strong desire of applause which he betrays in every syllable he utters. But they who converse with him, see that all the civilities they could do to him, or the kind things they could say to him, would fall short of what he expects; and therefore instead of shewing him the esteem they have for his merit, their reflexions turn only upon that they observe he has of it himself.

If you go among the women, and behold Gloriana trip into a room with that theatrical ostentation of her charms, Mirtilla with that soft regularity in her motion, Chloe with such an indifferent familiarity, Corinna with such a fond approach, and Roxana with such a demand of respect in the great gravity of her entrance; you find all the Sex, who understand themselves and act naturally, wait only for their absence, to tell you that all these Ladies would impose themselves upon you; and each of them carry in their behaviour a consciousness of so much more than they should pretend to, that they lose what would otherwise be given them.

I remember the last time I saw Macbeth, I was wonderfully taken with the skill of the Poet, in making the murderer form fears to himself from the moderation of the Prince whose life he was going to take away. He says of the King, 'he bore his faculties so meekly;' and justly inferred from thence, that all divine and human power would join to avenge his death, who had made such an abstinent use of dominion. All that is in a man's power to do to advance his own pomp and glory, and forbears, is so much laid up against the day of distress; and pity will always be his portion in adversity,

adversity, who acted with gentleness in prosperity.

The great Officer who foregoes the advantages he might take to himself, and renounces all prudential regards to his own person in danger, has so far the merit of a volunteer; and all his honours and glories are unenvied, for sharing the common fate with the same frankness as they do who have no such endearing circumstances to part with. But if there were no such considerations as the good effect which self-denial has upon the sense of other men towards us, it is of all qualities the most desirable for the agreeable disposition in which it places our own minds. I cannot tell what better to say of it, than that it is the very contrary of ambition; and that Modesty allays all those passions and inquietudes to which that vice exposes us. He that is moderate in his wishes from reason and choice, and not resigned from sourness, distaste, or disappointment, doubles all the pleasures of his life. The air, the season, a sun-shiny day, or a fair prospect, are instances of happiness, and that which he enjoys in common with all the world, (by his exemption from the enchantments by which all the world are bewitched) are to him uncommon benefits and new acquisitions. Health is not eaten up with care, nor pleasure interrupted by envy. It is not to him of any consequence what this man is famed for, or for what the other is preferred. He knows there is in such a place an uninterrupted walk; he can meet in such a company an agreeable conversation; he has no emulation, he is no man's rival, but every man's well-wisher; can look at a prosperous man, with a pleasure in reflecting that he hopes he is as happy as himself; and has his mind and his fortune (as far as prudence will allow) open to the unhappy and to the stranger.

Luceius has learning, wit, humour, eloquence, but no ambitious prospects to pursue with these advantages; therefore to the ordinary world he is perhaps thought to want spirit, but known among his friends to have a mind of the most consummate greatness. He wants no man's admiration, is in no need of pomp. His clothes please him if they are fashionable and warm; his companions are agreeable if they are civil and well-natured. There is with him no occasion for superfluity at meals, for jollity in company, in a word, for any thing extraordinary to administer delight to him. Want of prejudice and command of appetite are the companions which make his journey of life so easy, that he in all places meets with more wit, more good cheer and more good-humour, than is necessary to make him enjoy himself with pleasure and satisfaction.

T

N^o 207 Saturday, October 27.

*Omnibus in terris, quæ sunt à Gadibus usque Auroram & Gangem, pauci dignoscere possunt
Vera bona, atque illis multum diversa, remotâ
Erroris nebulâ——*

Juv. Sat. 10. v. 1.

Look round the habitable world, how few Know their own good, or, knowing it, pursue.

DRYDEN.

IN my last Saturday's Paper I laid down some thoughts upon Devotion in general, and shall here shew what were the notions of the most refined Heathens on this subject, as they are represented in Plato's dialogue upon prayer, intitled Alcibiades the Second, which doubtless gave occasion to Juvenal's tenth satire, and to the second satire of Perfius; as the last of these Authors has almost transcribed the preceding dialogue, intitled Alcibiades the First, in his fourth satire.

The speakers in this dialogue upon prayer, are Socrates and Alcibiades; and the substance of it (when drawn together out of the intricacies and digressions) as follows.

Socrates meeting his pupil Alcibiades, as he was going to his Devotions, and observing his eyes to be fixed upon the earth with great seriousness and attention, tells him, that he had reason to be thoughtful on that occasion, since it was possible for a man to bring down evils upon himself by his own prayers, and that those things, which the Gods send him in answer to his petitions, might turn to his destruction: This, says he, may not only happen when a man prays for what he knows is mischievous in its own nature, as Oedipus implored the Gods to sow dissension between his sons; but when he prays for what he believes would be for his good, and against what he believes would be to his detriment. This the Philosopher shews must necessarily happen among us, since most men are blinded with ignorance, prejudice, or passion, which hinder them from seeing such things as are really beneficial to them. For an instance, he asks Alcibiades, whether he would not be thoroughly pleased and satisfied if that God, to whom he was going to address himself, should promise to make him the Sovereign of the whole earth? Alcibiades answers, that he should doubtless look upon such a promise as the greatest favour that could be bestowed upon him. Socrates then asks him, if after receiving this great favour he would be contented to lose his life? or if he would receive it though he was sure he should make an ill use of it? To both which questions Alcibiades answers in the negative. Socrates then shews him, from the examples of others, how these might very probably be the effects of such a blessing. He then adds, that other reputed pieces of good-fortune, as that of having a son, or procuring the highest post in a government, are subject to the like fatal consequences; which nevernevertheless, says he, men ardently desire, and would not fail to pray for, if they thought their prayers might be effectual for the obtaining of them.

Having established this great point, that all the most apparent blessings in this life are obnoxious to such dreadful consequences, and that no man knows what in its events would prove to him a blessing or a curse, he teaches Alcibiades after what manner he ought to pray.

In the first place he recommends to him, as the model of his Devotions, a short prayer, which a Greek Poet composed for the use of his friends, in the following words: ‘ O Jupiter, ‘ give us those things which are good for us, ‘ whether they are such things as we pray for,
‘ or such things as we do not pray for: and ‘ remove from us those things which are hurtful, though they are such things as we pray for.’

In the second place, that his disciple may ask such things as are expedient for him, he shews him, that it is absolutely necessary to apply himself to the study of true wisdom, and to the knowledge of that which is his chief good, and the most suitable to the excellency of his nature.

In the third and last place he informs him, that the best methods he could make use of to draw down blessings upon himself, and to render his prayers acceptable, would be to live in a constant practice of his duty towards the Gods, and towards Men. Under this head he very much recommends a form of prayer the Lacedæmonians cedæmonians make use of, in which they petition the Gods, 'to give them all good things so long as they were virtuous.' Under this head likewise he gives a very remarkable account of an Oracle to the following purpose.

When the Athenians in the war with the Lacedæmonians received many defeats both by sea and land, they sent a message to the Oracle of Jupiter Ammon, to ask the reason why they who erected so many temples to the Gods, and adorned them with such costly offerings; why they who had instituted so many festivals, and accompanied them with such pomps and ceremonies; in short, why they who had slain so many hecatombs at their altars, should be less successful than the Lacedæmonians, who fell so short of them in all these particulars. To this, says he, the Oracle made the following reply; 'I am better pleased with the prayers of the Lacedæmonians, than with all the oblations of the Greeks.' As this prayer implied and encouraged virtue in those who made it; the Philosopher proceeds to shew how the most vicious man might be devout, so far as victims could make him, but that his offerings were regarded by the Gods as bribes, and his petitions as blasphemies. He likewise quotes on this occasion two verses out of Homer, in which the Poet says, that the scent of the Trojan sacrifices was carried up to heaven by the winds; but that it was not acceptable to the Gods, who were displeased with Priam and all his people.

The conclusion of this dialogue is very remarkable. Socrates having deterred Alcibiades from the prayers and sacrifice which he was going to offer, by setting forth the above-mentioned difficulties of performing that duty as he ought, adds these words, ' We must therefore wait until such time as we may learn how we ought to behave ourselves towards the Gods, and towards Men.' But when will that time come, says Alcibiades, and who is it that will instruct us? For I would fain see this man, whoever he is. It is one, says Socrates, who takes care of you; but as Homer tells us, that Minerva removed the mist from Diomedes his eyes, that he might plainly discover both Gods and men; so the darkness that hangs upon your mind must be removed before you are able to discern what is good and what is evil. Let him remove from my mind, says Alcibiades, the darkness, and what else he pleases, I am determined to refuse nothing he shall order me, whoever he is, so that I may become the better man by it. The remaining part of this dialogue is very obscure: There is something in it that would make us think Socrates hinted at himself, when he spoke of this divine Teacher who was to come into the world, did not he own that he himself was in this respect as much at a loss, and in as great distress as the rest of mankind.

Some learned men look upon this conclusion as a prediction of our Saviour, or at least that Socrates, like the High-Priest, prophesied unknowingly, and pointed at that divine Teacher who who was to come into the world some ages after him. However that may be, we find that this great Philosopher saw, by the light of reason, that it was suitable to the goodness of the Divine Nature, to send a person into the world who should instruct mankind in the duties of religion, and, in particular, teach them how to pray.

Whoever reads this abstract of Plato's discourse on prayer, will, I believe, naturally make this reflexion, that the great Founder of our religion, as well by his own example, as in the form of prayer which he taught his Disciples, did not only keep up to those rules which the light of nature had suggested to this great Philosopher, but instructed his disciples in the whole extent of this duty, as well as of all others. He directed them to the proper object of adoration, and taught them, according to the third rule above-mentioned, to apply themselves to him in their closets, without show or ostentation, and to worship him 'in spirit and in truth.' As the Lacedæmonians in their form of prayer implored the Gods in general to give them all good things so long as they were virtuous, we ask in particular 'that our offences may be forgiven, as we 'forgive those of others.' If we look into the second rule which Socrates has prescribed, namely, that we should apply ourselves to the knowledge of such things as are best for us, this too is explained at large in the doctrines of the Gospel, where we are taught in several instances to regard those things as curses, which appear as blessings in the eye of the world ; and on the contrary, to esteem those things as blessings, which to the generality of mankind appear as curses. Thus in the form which is prescribed to us we only pray for that happiness which is our chief good, and the great end of our existence, when we petition the supreme Being for 'the coming of his kingdom,' being solicitous for no other temporal blessings but our daily sustenance. On the other side, we pray against nothing but sin, and against evil in general, leaving it with Omniscience to determine what is really such. If we look into the first of Socrates his rules of prayer, in which he recommends the above-mentioned form of the ancient Poet, we find that form not only comprehended, but very much improved in the petition, wherein we pray to the supreme Being that 'his will may be done:' which is of the same force with that form which our Saviour used, when he prayed against the most painful and most ignominious of deaths, 'Nevertheless not my will, but thine be done.' This comprehensive petition is the most humble, as well as the most prudent, that can be offered up from the Creature to his Creator, as it supposes the supreme Being wills nothing but what is for our good, and that he knows better than ourselves what is so. L

con-

N^o 208 Monday, October 29.

——— Veniunt spectentur ut ipsæ.

Ovid. Ars Am. l. i. v. 99,

To be themselves a spectacle, they come.

I Have several Letters from people of good sense, who lament the depravity or poverty of taste the town is fallen into with relation to plays and public spectacles. A Lady in particular observes, that there is such a levity in the minds of her own Sex, that they seldom attend any thing but impertinences. It is indeed prodigious to observe how little notice is taken of the most exalted parts of the best Tragedies in Shakespear; nay, it is not only visible that sensuality has devoured all greatness of Soul, but the underpassion (as I may so call it) of a noble spirit, pity, seems to be a stranger to the generality of an audience. The minds of men are indeed very differently disposed; and the reliefs from care and attention are of one sort in a great spirit, and of another in an ordinary one. The man of a great heart and a serious complexion, is more pleased with instances of generosity and pity, than the light and ludicrous spirit can possibly be with the highest strains of mirth and laughter: It is therefore a melancholy prospect when we see a numerous assembly lost to all serious entertainments, tainments, and such incidents, as should move one sort of concern, excite in them a quite contrary one. In the Tragedy of Macbeth, the other night, when the Lady who is conscious of the crime of murdering the King, seems utterly astonished at the news, and makes an exclamation at it; instead of the indignation which is natural to the occasion, that expression is received with a loud laugh: They were as merry when a criminal was stabbed. It is certainly an occasion of rejoicing when the wicked are seized in their designs; but I think it is not such a triumph as is exerted by laughter.

You may generally observe, that the appetites are sooner moved than the passions: A sly expression which alludes to bawdry, puts a whole row into a pleasing smirk; when a good sentence that describes an inward sentiment of the Soul, is received with the greatest coldness and indifference. A correspondent of mine, upon this subject, has divided the female part of the audience, and accounts for their prepossessions against this reasonable delight in the following manner. The Prude, says he, as she acts always in contradiction, so she is gravely sullen at a Comedy, and extravagantly gay at a Tragedy. The Coquette is so much taken up with throwing her eyes around the audience, and considering the effect of them, that she cannot be expected to observe the Actors but as they are her rivals, and take off the observation of the men from herself. Besides these species of women, there are the Examples, or the first of the Mode: These

These are to be supposed to be too well acquainted with what the Actor was going to say to be moved at it. After these one might mention a certain flippant set of females who are mimics, and are wonderfully diverted with the conduct of all the people around them, and are spectators only of the audience. But what is of all the most to be lamented, is the loss of a party whom it would be worth preserving in their right senses upon all occasions, and these are those whom we may indifferently call the innocent or the unaffected. You may sometimes see one of these sensibly touched with a well-wrought incident; but then she is immediately so impertinently observed by the men, and frowned at by some insensible superior of her own Sex, that she is ashamed, and loses the enjoyment of the most laudable concern, pity. Thus the whole audience is afraid of letting fall a tear, and shun as a weakness the best and worthiest part of our sense.

S I R,

AS you are one that doth not only pretend to reform, but effect it amongst people of any sense; makes me (who am one of the greatest of your admirers) give you this trouble to desire you will settle the method of us females knowing when one another is in town: For they have now got a trick of never sending to their acquaintance when they first come; and if one does not visit them within the week which they stay at home, it is a mortal quarrel. Now, dear Mr. S P E C, either command them

to

' to put it in the advertisement of your Paper,
 ' which is generally read by our Sex, or else order
 ' them to breathe their faucy footmen (who are ' good for nothing else) by sending them to tell
 ' all their acquaintance. If you think to print
 ' this, pray put it into a better stile as to the ' spelling part. The town is now filling every ' day, and it cannot be deferred, because people
 ' take advantage of one another by this means
 ' and break off acquaintance, and are rude :
 ' Therefore pray put this in your Paper as soon
 ' as you can possibly, to prevent any future
 ' miscarriages of this nature. I am, as I ever
 ' shall be,

Dear SPEC,

Your most obedient humble servant,

Mary Meanwell.

' Pray settle what is to be a proper notification
 ' of a person's being in town, and how that ' differs according to people's quality.

Mr. SPECTATOR, October the 20th.

' I Have been out of town, so did not meet
 ' with your Paper dated September the 28th,
 ' wherein you, to my heart's desire, expose that
 ' cursed vice of insnaring poor young girls, and ' drawing them from their friends. I assure ' you without flattery it has saved a 'prentice of ' mine from ruin ; and in token of gratitude as ' well as for the benefit of my family, I have put ' it in a frame and glass, and hung it behind my ' counter.

counter. I shall take care to make my young ones read it every morning, to fortify them against such pernicious rascals. I know not whether what you writ was matter of fact, or your own invention; but this I will take my oath on, the first part is so exactly like what happened to my 'prentice, that had I read your Paper then, I should have taken your method to have secured a villain. Go on and prosper.

Your most obliged humble servant.

MR. SPECTATOR,

Without rallery, I desire you to insert this word for word in your next, as you value a Lover's prayers. You see it is an hue and cry after a stray heart (with the marks and blemishes under-written) which whoever shall bring to you, shall receive satisfaction. Let me beg of you not to fail, as you remember the passion you had for her to whom you lately ended a Paper.

Noble, generous, great and good,
But never to be understood;
Fickle as the wind, still changing,
After every female ranging,
Panting, trembling, sighing, dying,
But addicted much to lying:
When the Siren songs repeats,
Equal measures still it beats;
Whoe'er shall wear it, it will smart her,
And whoe'er takes it, takes a Tartar.

T

N^o 209 Tuesday, October 30.

Γυναικὸς οὐδὲ χρῆμ' ἀνὴρ ληΐζεται Ἐσθλῆς ἀμεινον, οὐδὲ ρίγιον κακῆς.

Simonides.

Of earthly goods the best, is a good wife;
A bad, the bitterest curse of human life.

THERE are no Authors I am more pleased with, than those who shew human nature in a variety of views, and describe the several ages of the world in their different manners. A reader cannot be more rationally entertained, than by comparing the virtues and vices of his own times with those which prevailed in the times of his forefathers; and drawing a parallel in his mind between his own private character, and that of other persons, whether of his own age, or of the ages that went before him. The contemplation of mankind under these changeable colours, is apt to shame us out of any particular vice, or animate us to any particular virtue; to make us pleased or displeased with ourselves in the most proper points, to clear our minds of prejudice and prepossession, and rectify that narrowness of temper which inclines us to think amiss of those who differ from ourselves.

If we look into the manners of the most remote ages of the world, we discover human nature nature in her simplicity; and the more we come downward towards our own times, may observe her hiding herself in artifices and refinements, polished insensibly out of her original plainness, and at length intirely lost under form and ceremony, and (what we call) good-breeding. Read the accounts of men and women as they are given us by the most ancient writers, both sacred and profane, and you would think you were reading the history of another species.

Among the writers of antiquity, there are none who instruct us more openly in the manners of their respective times in which they lived, than those who have employed themselves in satire, under what dress soever it may appear; as there are no other Authors whose province it is to enter so directly into the ways of men, and set their miscarriages in so strong a light.

Simonides, a Poet famous in his generation, is, I think, Author of the oldest Satire that is now extant; and, as some say, of the first that was ever written. This Poet flourished about four hundred years after the siege of Troy; and, shews, by his way of writing, the simplicity, or rather coarseness, of the age in which he lived. I have taken notice, in my hundred and sixty first Speculation, that the rule of observing what the French call the Bienfiance, in an allusion, has been found out of later years; and that the ancients, provided there was a likeness in their similitudes, did not much trouble themselves about the decency of the comparison.

The Satire or Iambics of Simonides, with which I shall entertain my readers in the present Paper, are a remarkable instance of what I formerly advanced. The subject of this Satire is Woman. He describes the Sex in their several characters, which he derives to them from a fanciful supposition raised upon the doctrine of præ-existence. He tells us, that the Gods formed the Souls of women out of those seeds and principles which compose several kinds of animals and elements; and that their good or bad dispositions arise in them according as such and such seeds and principles predominate in their constitutions. I have translated the Author very faithfully, and if not word for word (which our language would not bear) at least so as to comprehend every one of his sentiments, without adding any thing of my own. I have already apologized for this Author's want of delicacy, and must further premise, that the following Satire effects only some of the lower part of the Sex, and not those who have been refined by a polite education, which was not so common in the age of this Poet.

' In the beginning God made the Souls of ' womankind out of different materials, and in ' a separate state from their bodies.

' The Souls of one kind of women were ' formed out of those ingredients which com' pose a Swine. A woman of this make is a ' slut in her house and a glutton at her table.
' She is uncleanly in her person, a flattern in ' her

‘ her dress, and her family is no better than ‘ a dunghil.

‘ A second sort of female Soul was formed ‘ out of the same materials that enter into the ‘ composition of a Fox. Such an one is what ‘ we call a notable discerning woman, who ‘ has an insight into every thing, whether it be ‘ good or bad. In this species of females there ‘ are some virtuous and some vicious.

‘ A third kind of women were made up of ‘ Canine Particles. These are what we com‘ monly call Scolds, who imitate the animals ‘ out of which they were taken, that are al‘ ways busy and barking, that snarl at every ‘ one who comes in their way, and live in per‘ petual clamour.

‘ The fourth kind of women were made out ‘ of the Earth. These are your Sluggards, who ‘ pass away their time in indolence and igno‘ rance, hover over the fire a whole winter, and ‘ apply themselves with alacrity to no kind of ‘ business but eating.

‘ The fifth species of females were made out ‘ of the Sea. These are women of variable ‘ uneven tempers, sometimes all storm and ‘ tempests, sometimes all calm and sunshine.
‘ The stranger who sees one of these in her ‘ smiles and smoothness, would cry her up for ‘ a miracle of good-humour; but on a sudden ‘ her looks and her words are changed, she ‘ is nothing but fury and outrage, noise and ‘ hurricane.

‘ The sixth species were made up of the ingredients which compose an Ass, or a beast of burden. These are naturally exceeding slothful, but, upon the husband’s exerting his authority, will live upon hard fare, and do every thing to please him. They are however far from being averse to venereal pleasure, and seldom refuse a male companion.

‘ The Cat furnished materials for a seventh species of women, who are of a melancholy, froward, unamiable nature, and so repugnant to the offers of love, that they fly in the face of their husband when he approaches them with conjugal endearments. This species of women are likewise subject to little thefts, cheats, and pilferings.

‘ The Mare with a flowing mane, which was never broke to any servile toil and labour, composed an eighth species of women. These are they who have little regard for their husbands, who pass away their time in dressing, bathing, and perfuming; who throw their hair into the nicest curls, and trick it up with the fairest flowers and garlands. A woman of this species is a very pretty thing for a stranger to look upon, but very detrimental to the owner, unless it be a King or Prince who takes a fancy to such a toy.

‘ The ninth species of females were taken out of the Ape. These are such as are both ugly and ill-natured, who have nothing beautiful in themselves, and endeavour to detract

‘ from or ridicule every thing which appears ‘ so in others.

‘ The tenth and last species of women were ‘ made out of the Bee; and happy is the man ‘ who gets such an one for his wife. She is ‘ altogether faultless and unblameable; her fa‘ mily flourishes and improves by her good ma‘ nagement. She loves her husband, and is ‘ beloved by him. She brings him a race of ‘ beautiful and virtuous children. She distin‘ guishes herself among her Sex. She is sur‘ rounded with graces. She never sits among ‘ the loose tribe of women, nor passes away her ‘ time with them in wanton discourses. She is ‘ full of virtue and prudence, and is the best ‘ wife that Jupiter can bestow on man.’

I shall conclude these Iambics with the motto of this Paper, which is a fragment of the same Author: ‘ A man cannot possess any thing that ‘ is better than a good woman, nor any thing ‘ that is worse than a bad one.’

As the Poet has shewn a great penetration in this diversity of female characters, he has avoided the fault which Juvenal and Monsieur Boileau are guilty of, the former in his sixth, and the other in his last Satire, where they have endeavoured to expose the Sex in general, without doing justice to the valuable part of it.
Such levelling Satires are of no use to the world, and for this reason I have often wondered how the French Author above-mentioned, who was a man of exquisite judgment, and a lover of virtue, virtue, could think human nature a proper subject for satire in another of his celebrated pieces, which is called The Satire upon Man. What vice or frailty can a discourse correct, which censures the whole species alike, and endeavours to shew by some superficial strokes of wit, that brutes are the most excellent creatures of the two? A Satire should expose nothing but what is corrigible, and make a due discrimination between those who are, and those who are not the proper objects of it. L

N^o 210 Wednesday, October 31.

Nescio quomodo inhæret in mentibus quasi seculorum quoddam augurium futurorum; idque in maximis ingeniis altissimisque animis & existit maxime & apparet facillime.
Cic. Tusc. Quæst.

There is, I know not how, in the minds of men a certain presage, as it were, of a future existence; and this takes the deepest root, and is most discoverable in the greatest genius's and most exalted souls.

To the SPECTATOR.

SIR,

I Am fully persuaded that one of the best springs of generous and worthy actions, is the having generous and worthy thoughts of ourselves. Whoever has a mean opinion
of

‘ of the dignity of his nature, will act in no ‘ higher a rank than he has allotted himself ‘ in his own estimation. If he considers his ‘ Being as circumscribed by the uncertain term ‘ of a few years, his designs will be contracted ‘ into the same narrow span he imagines is to ‘ bound his existence. How can he exalt his ‘ thoughts to any thing great and noble, who ‘ only believes that, after a short turn on the ‘ stage of this world, he is to sink into oblivion,
‘ and to lose his consciousness for ever ?

‘ For this reason I am of opinion, that so ‘ useful and elevated a contemplation as that of ‘ the Soul’s Immortality cannot be resumed too ‘ often. There is not a more improving exercise ‘ to the human mind, than to be frequently ‘ reviewing its own great privileges
‘ and endowments; nor a more effectual means ‘ to awaken in us an ambition raised above ‘ low objects and little pursuits, than to value ‘ ourselves as heirs of eternity.

‘ It is a very great satisfaction to consider ‘ the best and wisest of mankind in all nations ‘ and ages, asserting, as with one voice, this ‘ their birthright, and to find it ratified by an ‘ express Revelation. At the same time if we ‘ turn our thoughts inward upon ourselves, ‘ we may meet with a kind of secret sense ‘ concurring with the proofs of our own Immortality.

‘ You have, in my opinion, raised a good ‘ presumptive argument from the increasing ‘ appetite the mind has to knowledge, and to
‘ the

‘ the extending its own faculties, which cannot be accomplished, as the more restrained perfection of lower creatures may, in the limits of a short life. I think another probable conjecture may be raised from our appetite to duration itself, and from a reflexion on our progress through the several stages of it: “ We are complaining,” as you observe in a former Speculation, “ of the shortness of life, and yet are perpetually hurrying over the parts of it, to arrive at certain little settlements, or imaginary points of rest, which are dispersed up and down in it.”

‘ Now let us consider what happens to us when we arrive at these “ imaginary points of rest.” Do we stop our motion, and sit down satisfied in the settlement we have gained? or are we not removing the boundary, and marking out new points of rest, to which we press forward with the like eagerness, and which cease to be such as fast as we attain them? Our case is like that of a Traveller upon the Alps, who should fancy that the top of the next hill must end his journey, because it terminates his prospect; but he no sooner arrives at it, than he sees new ground and other hills beyond it, and continues to travel on as before.

‘ This is so plainly every man’s condition in life, that there is no one who has observed any thing, but may observe, that as fast as his time wears away, his appetite to something Future remains. The use therefore I ‘ would

‘ would make of it is this, that since nature ‘ (as some love to express it) does nothing in ‘ vain, or, to speak properly, since the Author ‘ of our Being has planted no wandering passion ‘ in it, no desire which has not its object, ‘ Futurity is the proper object of the passion so ‘ constantly exercised about it; and this restlessness ‘ in the present, this assigning ourselves over ‘ to farther stages of duration, this successive ‘ grasping at somewhat still to come, appears ‘ to me (whatever it may to others) as a kind ‘ of instinct or natural symptom which the ‘ mind of man has of its own Immortality.

‘ I take it at the same time for granted, that ‘ the Immortality of the Soul is sufficiently established ‘ by other arguments: And if so, this ‘ appetite, which otherwise would be very unaccountable ‘ and absurd, seems very reasonable,
‘ and adds strength to the conclusion. But I ‘ am amazed when I consider there are creatures ‘ capable of thought, who, in spite of every ‘ argument, can form to themselves a sullen satisfaction ‘ in thinking otherwise. There is something ‘ so pitifully mean in the inverted ambition
‘ of that man who can hope for annihilation,
‘ and please himself to think that his whole ‘ fabric shall one day crumble into dust, and ‘ mix with the mass of inanimate Beings, that ‘ it equally deserves our admiration and pity.
‘ The mystery of such men’s unbelief is not ‘ hard to be penetrated; and indeed amounts ‘ to nothing more than a sordid hope that ‘ they

‘ they shall not be Immortal, because they dare ‘ not be so.

‘ This brings me back to my first observation, ‘ and gives me occasion to say further, that as ‘ worthy actions spring from worthy thoughts,
‘ so worthy thoughts are likewise the consequence of worthy actions: But the wretch ‘ who has degraded himself below the character of Immortality, is very willing to resign his pretensions to it, and substitute in its ‘ room a dark negative happiness in the extinction of his Being.

‘ The admirable Shakespear has given us a ‘ strong image of the unsupported condition of ‘ such a person in his last minutes in the second ‘ part of King Henry the sixth, where Cardinal ‘ Beaufort, who had been concerned in the ‘ murder of the good Duke Humphrey, is represented on his death-bed. After some short ‘ confused speeches which shew an imagination ‘ disturbed with guilt, just as he was expiring, ‘ King Henry standing by him full of compassion, says,

‘ Lord Cardinal! if thou think’st on Heav’n’s bliss, ‘ Hold up thy hand, make signal of that hope!
‘ He dies, and makes no sign! —

‘ The despair which is here shewn, without ‘ a word or action on the part of the dying ‘ person, is beyond what could be painted by ‘ the most forcible expressions whatever.

‘ I shall not pursue this thought farther, but ‘ only add, that as annihilation is not to be ‘ had

‘ had with a wish, so it is the most abject thing ‘ in the world to wish it. What are honour, ‘ fame, wealth, or power, when compared with ‘ the generous expectation of a Being without ‘ end, and a happiness adequate to that Being ?

‘ I shall trouble you no farther ; but with a ‘ certain gravity which these thoughts have given ‘ me, I reflect upon some things people say of ‘ you, (as they will of men who distinguish ‘ themselves), which I hope are not true ; and ‘ wish you as good a man as you are an Author:

I am, Sir,

Your most obedient humble servant,

Z

T. D.

N^o 211 Thursday, November 1.

Fictis meminerit nos jocari fabulis.

Phædr. l. 1. Prol.

Let it be remember'd that we sport in fabled stories.

HAVING lately translated the fragment of an old Poet which describes woman-kind under several characters, and supposes them to have drawn their different manners and dispositions from those animals and elements out of which he tells us they were compounded ; I had some thoughts of giving the Sex their revenge, by laying together in another Paper the many many vicious characters which prevail in the male world, and shewing the different ingredients that go to the making up of such different humours and constitutions. Horace has a thought which is something akin to this, when, in order to excuse himself to his mistress, for an invective which he had written against her, and to account for that unreasonable fury with which the heart of man is often transported, he tells us that, when Prometheus made his man of clay, in the kneading up of the heart, he seasoned it with some furious particles of the Lion. But upon turning this plan to and fro in my thoughts, I observed so many unaccountable humours in man, that I did not know out of what animals to fetch them. Male Souls are diversified with so many characters, that the world has not variety of materials sufficient to furnish out their different tempers and inclinations. The creation, with all its animals and elements, would not be large enough to supply their several extravagancies.

Instead therefore of pursuing the thought of Simonides, I shall observe, that as he has exposed the vicious part of women from the doctrine of præ-existence, some of the ancient Philosophers have, in a manner, satirized the vicious part of the human species in general, from a notion of the Soul's post-existence, if I may so call it; and that as Simonides describes brutes entering into the composition of women, others have represented human Souls as entering into brutes. This is commonly termed the doctrine of transmigration, which supposes that human Souls,

Souls, upon their leaving the body, become the Souls of such kinds of brutes as they most resemble in their manners ; or to give an account of it, as Mr. Dryden has described it in his translation of Pythagoras his speech in the fifteenth book of Ovid, where that Philosopher dissuades his hearers from eating flesh :

Thus all things are but alter'd, nothing dies,
And here and there th' unbody'd Spirit flies :
By time, or force, or sickness dispossest'd,
And lodges where it lights, in bird or beast,
Or hunts without till ready limbs it find,
And actuates those according to their kind :
From tenement to tenement is toss'd :
The Soul is still the same, the figure only lost.

Then let not piety be put to flight,
To please the taste of glutton-appetite ;
But suffer inmate Souls secure to dwell,
Left from their seats your parents you expel ;
With rabid hunger feed upon your kind,
Or from a beast dislodge a brother's mind.

Plato in the vision of Erus the Armenian, which I may possibly make the subject of a future Speculation, records some beautiful transmutations ; as that the Soul of Orpheus who was musical, melancholy, and a woman-hater, entered into a Swan ; the Soul of Ajax, which was all wrath and fierceness, into a Lion ; the Soul of Agamemnon, that was rapacious and imperial, into an Eagle ; and the Soul of Thersites, who was a mimic and a buffoon, into a Monkey.

Mr. Congreve, in a prologue to one of his Comedies, has touched upon this doctrine with great humour.

Thus Aristotle's Soul of old that was,
May now be damn'd to animate an ass;
Or in this very house, for ought we know,
Is doing painful penance in some Beau.

I shall fill up this Paper with some Letters which my last Tuesday's Speculation has produced. My following correspondents will shew, what I there observed, that the Speculation of that day affects only the lower part of the Sex.

From my house in the Strand, October 30, 1711.

MR. SPECTATOR,

‘ UPON reading your Tuesday's Paper, I ‘ find by several symptoms in my constitution that I am a Bee. My shop, or, if you ‘ please to call it so, my cell, is in that great ‘ hive of females which goes by the name of ‘ the New-Exchange; where I am daily employed in gathering together a little stock of ‘ gain from the finest flowers about the town, ‘ I mean the Ladies and the Beaus. I have a ‘ numerous swarm of children, to whom I give ‘ the best education I am able: But, Sir, it is ‘ my misfortune to be married to a Drone, who ‘ lives upon what I get, without bringing any ‘ thing into the common stock. Now, Sir, as ‘ on the one hand I take care not to behave ‘ myself towards him like a Wasp, so likewise I V O L. III. R would

‘ would not have him look upon me as an ‘ Humble-bee; for which reason I do all I can ‘ to put him upon laying up provisions for a ‘ bad day, and frequently represent to him the ‘ fatal effects his sloth and negligence may bring ‘ upon us in our old age. I must beg that you ‘ will join with me in your good advice upon ‘ this occasion, and you will for ever oblige

Your humble servant,

MELISSA.

S I R, Picadilly, October 31, 1711.

‘ I Am joined in wedlock for my sins to one ‘ of those Fillies who are described in the old ‘ Poet with that hard name you gave us the ‘ other day. She has a flowing mane, and a ‘ skin as soft as silk: But, Sir, she passes half ‘ her life at her glass, and almost ruins me in ‘ ribbons. For my own part, I am a plain ‘ handicraft man, and in danger of breaking by ‘ her laziness and expensiveness. Pray, Master, ‘ tell me in your next Paper, whether I may ‘ not expect of her so much drudgery as to ‘ take care of her family, and to curry her hide ‘ in case of refusal.

Your loving friend,

Barnaby Brittle.

Mr.

Mr. SPECTATOR, Cheapside, October 30.

I Am mightily pleased with the humour of the Cat, be so kind as to enlarge upon that subject.

Yours until death,

Josiah Henpeck.

P. S. ' You must know I am married to a Grimalkin.

S I R, Wapping, October 31, 1711.

EVER since your Spectator of Tuesday last came into our family, my husband is pleased to call me his Oceana, because the foolish old Poet that you have translated says, That the Souls of some women are made of Sea-water. This, it seems, has encouraged my sauce-box to be witty upon me. When I am angry, he cries, pr'ythee my dear be calm; when I chide one of my servants, Pr'ythee child do not bluster. He had the impudence about an hour ago to tell me that he was a sea-faring man, and must expect to divide his life between storm and sunshine. When I bestir myself with any spirit in my family, it is high sea in his house; and when I sit still without doing any thing, his affairs forsooth are wind-bound. When I ask him whether it rains, he makes answer, it is no matter, so that it be fair weather within doors. In short, Sir, I cannot speak my mind freely to him, but I

‘ either swell or rage, or do something that is ‘ not fit for a civil woman to hear. Pray, ‘ Mr. SPECTATOR, since you are so sharp ‘ upon other women, let us know what ma‘ terials your wife is made of, if you have one.
 ‘ I suppose you would make us a parcel of ‘ poor-spirited tame insipid creatures; but, Sir, ‘ I would have you to know, we have as good ‘ passions in us as yourself, and that a woman ‘ was never designed to be a milk-sop.

L

Martha Tempest.

N^o 212 Friday, November 2.

———Eripe turpi

Colla jugo, liber, liber sum, dic age ——

Hor. Sat. 7. l. 2. v. 92.

——Loose thy neck from this ignoble chain,
 And boldly say thou’rt free.

CREECH.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

‘ I Never look upon my dear wife, but I think ‘ of the happiness Sir ROGER DE COVERLEY
 ‘ enjoys, in having such a friend as you to ex‘ pose in proper colours the cruelty and per‘ verseness of his mistress. I have very often ‘ wished you visited in our family, and were ‘ acquainted with my spouse; she would afford ‘ you for some months at least matter enough ‘ for one Spectator a week. Since we are not ‘ so

‘ so happy as to be of your acquaintance, give ‘ me leave to represent to you our present cir‘ cumstances as well as I can in writing. You ‘ are to know then that I am not of a very ‘ different constitution from Nathaniel Henrooff, ‘ whom you have lately recorded in your Spe‘ culations; and have a wife who makes a ‘ more tyrannical use of the knowledge of my ‘ easy temper than that Lady ever pretended to.
‘ We had not been a month married, when ‘ she found in me a certain pain to give offence, ‘ and an indolence that made me bear little ‘ inconveniences rather than dispute about them.
‘ From this observation it soon came to that ‘ pass, that if I offered to go abroad, she would ‘ get between me and the door, kiss me, and ‘ say she could not part with me; and then ‘ down again I sat. In a day or two after this ‘ first pleasant step towards confining me, she ‘ declared to me, that I was all the world to ‘ her, and she thought she ought to be all the ‘ world to me. If, said she, my Dear loves ‘ me as much as I love him, he will never be ‘ tired of my company. This declaration was ‘ followed by my being denied to all my ac‘ quaintance; and it very soon came to that ‘ pass, that to give an answer at the door before ‘ my face, the servants would ask her whether ‘ I was within or not; and she would answer
‘ No with great fondness, and tell me I was a ‘ good Dear. I will not enumerate more little ‘ circumstances to give you a livelier sense of ‘ my condition; but tell you in general, that

' from such steps as these at first, I now live
 ' the life of a prisoner of state; my Letters are ' opened, and I have not the use of pen, ink
 ' and paper, but in her presence. I never go ' abroad, except she sometimes takes me with ' her in her coach to take the air, if it may be ' called so, when we drive, as we generally do,
 ' with the glasses up. I have overheard my ' servants lament my condition, but they dare
 ' not bring me messages without her know' ledge, because they doubt my resolution to ' stand by them. In the midst of this insipid
 ' way of life, an old acquaintance of mine,
 ' Tom Meggot, who is a favourite with her, and
 ' allowed to visit me in her company because ' he sings prettily, has roused me to rebel, and
 ' conveyed his intelligence to me in the fol' lowing manner. My wife is a great pre-' tender to music, and very ignorant of it; but ' far gone in the Italian taste. Tom goes to
 ' Armstrong, the famous fine writer of music,
 ' and desires him to put this sentence of Tully
 ' in the scale of an Italian air, and write it out
 ' for my spouse from him. "An ille mihi liber
 " cui mulier imperat? Cui leges imponit, præ-
 " scribit, jubet, vetat, quod videtur? Qui nihil
 " imperanti negare, nihil recusare audet? Poscit?
 " dandum est. Vocat? veniendum. Ejicit? ab-
 " eundum. Minitatur? extimescendum. Does he " live like a Gentleman who is commanded by " a Woman? He to whom she gives law,
 " grants and denies what she pleases? who " can

“ can neither deny her any thing she asks; or “ refuse to do any thing she commands.”

‘ To be short, my wife was extremely pleased ‘ with it; said the Italian was the only lan‘ guage for music; and admired how won‘ derfully tender the sentiment was, and how ‘ pretty the accent is of that language, with ‘ the rest that is said by rote on that occasion.
‘ Mr. Meggot is sent for to sing this air, which ‘ he performs with mighty applause; and my ‘ wife is in ecstasy on the occasion, and glad ‘ to find, by my being so much pleased, that ‘ I was at last come into the notion of the ‘ Italian; for, said she, it grows upon one ‘ when one once comes to know a little of ‘ the language; and pray, Mr. Meggot, sing ‘ again those notes, Nihil Imperanti negare, ‘ nihil recusare. You may believe I was not a ‘ little delighted with my friend Tom’s expe‘ dient to alarm me, and in obedience to his ‘ summons I give all this story thus at large;
‘ and I am resolved, when this appears in the ‘ Spectator, to declare for myself. The man‘ ner of the insurrection I contrive by your ‘ means, which shall be no other than that ‘ Tom Meggot, who is at our tea-table every ‘ morning, shall read it to us; and if my ‘ Dear can take the hint, and say not one ‘ word, but let this be the beginning of a new ‘ life without farther explanation; it is very ‘ well; for as soon as the Spectator is read ‘ out, I shall, without more ado, call for the ‘ coach, name the hour when I shall be at ‘ home, if I come at all; if I do not, they may ‘ go to dinner. If my spouse only swells and ‘ says nothing, Tom and I go out together, and ‘ all is well, as I said before; but if she begins ‘ to command or expostulate, you shall in my ‘ next to you receive a full account of her re‘ sistance and submission, for submit the dear ‘ thing must to,

Sir,

your most obedient humble servant,

Anthony Freeman.

P. S. ‘ I hope I need not tell you that I ‘ desire this may be in your very next. T

N^o 213 Saturday, November 3.

— Mens sibi conscia recti. Vig. Æn. I. v. 608.

A good Intention.

IT is the great art and secret of Christianity, if I may use that phrase, to manage our actions to the best advantage, and direct them in such a manner, that every thing we do may turn to account at that great day, when every thing we have done will be set before us.

In order to give this consideration its full weight, we may cast all our actions under the division of such as are in themselves either good, evil, or indifferent. If we divide our Intentions after the same manner, and consider them with regard to our actions, we may discover that great art and secret of Religion which I have here mentioned.
 4 evil,

A good Intention joined to a good Action, gives it its proper force and efficacy; joined to an evil Action, extenuates its malignity, and in some cases may take it wholly away; and joined to an indifferent Action turns it to a virtue, and makes it meritorious as far as human Actions can be so.

In the next place, to consider in the same manner the influence of an evil Intention upon our Actions. An evil Intention perverts the best of Actions, and makes them in reality, what the fathers with a witty kind of zeal have termed the virtues of the heathen world, so many shining sins. It destroys the innocence of an indifferent Action, and gives an evil Action all possible blackness and horror, or in the emphatical language of sacred Writ, makes 'sin exceeding sinful.'

If, in the last place, we consider the nature of an indifferent Intention, we shall find that it destroys the merit of a good Action; abates, but never takes away, the malignity of an evil Action; and leaves an indifferent Action in its natural state of indifference.

It is therefore of unspeakable advantage to possess our minds with an habitual good Intention, and to aim all our thoughts, words, and actions at some laudable end, whether it be the glory of our Maker, the good of Mankind, or the benefit of our own souls.

This is a sort of thrift or good-husbandry in moral life, which does not throw away any single action, but makes every one go as far as it can. It multiplies the means of salvation, increases the number of our virtues, and diminishes that of our vices.

There is something very devout, though not solid, in Acoſta's answer to Limborch, who objects to him the multiplicity of ceremonies in the Jewish religion, as washings, dresses, meats, purgations, and the like. The reply which the Jew makes upon this occasion, is, to the best of my remembrance, as follows: 'There are not duties enough (says he) in the essential parts of the law for a zealous and active obedience. Time, place, and person are requisite, before you have an opportunity of putting a moral virtue into practice. We have therefore, says he, enlarged the sphere of our duty, and made many things, which are in themselves indifferent, a part of our religion, that we may have more occasions of shewing our love to God, and in all the circumstances of life be doing something to please him.'

Monſieur Saint Evremond has endeavoured to palliate the superstitions of the Roman-catholic religion with the same kind of apology, where he pretends to consider the different spirit of the Papists and the Calvinists, as to the great points wherein they disagree. He tells us, that the former are actuated by love, and the other by fear; and that in their expressions of duty and devotion towards the supreme Being, the former seem

seem particularly careful to do every thing which may possibly please him, and the other to abstain from every thing which may possibly displease him.

But notwithstanding this plausible reason with which both the Jew and the Roman-catholic would excuse their respective superstitions, it is certain there is something in them very pernicious to mankind, and destructive to religion; because the injunction of superfluous ceremonies makes such Actions duties, as were before indifferent, and by that means renders religion more burdensom and difficult than it is in its own nature, betrays many into sins of omission which they could not otherwise be guilty of, and fixes the minds of the vulgar to the shadowy unessential points, instead of the more weighty and more important matters of the law.

This zealous and active obedience however takes place in the great point we are recommending; for if, instead of prescribing to ourselves indifferent Actions as duties, we apply a good Intention to all our most indifferent Actions, we make our very existence one continued act of obedience, we turn our diversions and amusements to our eternal advantage, and are pleasing Him (whom we are made to please) in all the circumstances and occurrences of life.

It is this excellent frame of mind, this holy officiousness (if I may be allowed to call it such) which is recommended to us by the Apostle in that uncommon precept, wherein he directs us to propose to ourselves the glory of our Creator
in

in all our most indifferent Actions, 'whether ' we eat or drink, or whatsoever we do.'

A person therefore who is possessed with such an habitual good Intention, as that which I have been here speaking of, enters upon no single circumstance of life, without considering it as well-pleasing to the great Author of his Being, conformable to the dictates of reason, suitable to human nature in general, or to that particular station in which Providence has placed him. He lives in a perpetual sense of the Divine Presence, regards himself as acting, in the whole course of his existence, under the observation and inspection of that Being, who is privy to all his motions and all his thoughts, who knows his 'down-sitting and his up-rising, who is about 'his path, and about his bed, and spieth out all 'his ways.' In a word, he remembers that the eye of his Judge is always upon him, and in every action he reflects that he is doing what is commanded or allowed by him who will hereafter either reward or punish it. This was the character of those holy men of old, who in that beautiful phrase of Scripture are said to have 'walked with God.'

When I employ myself upon a Paper of Morality, I generally consider how I may recommend the particular virtue which I treat of, by the precepts or examples of the ancient heathens; by that means, if possible, to shame those who have greater advantages of knowing their duty, and therefore greater obligations to perform it, into a better course of life: Besides that many among

among us are unreasonably disposed to give a fairer hearing to a pagan Philosopher, than to a christian Writer.

I shall therefore produce an instance of this excellent frame of mind in a speech of Socrates, which is quoted by Erasmus. This great Philosopher on the day of his execution, a little before the draught of poison was brought to him, entertaining his friends with a discourse on the Immortality of the Soul, has these words: ‘ Whether or no God will approve of my actions, I know not; but this I am sure of, that I have at all times made it my endeavour to please him, and I have a good hope that this my endeavour will be accepted by him.’ We find in these words of that great man the habitual good Intention which I would here inculcate, and with which that divine Philosopher always acted. I shall only add, that Erasmus, who was an unbigotted Roman-catholic, was so much transported with this passage of Socrates, that he could scarce forbear looking upon him as a Saint, and desiring him to pray for him; or as that ingenious and learned writer has expressed himself in a much more lively manner: ‘ When I reflect on such a speech pronounced by such a person, I can scarce forbear crying out, sancte Socrates, ora pro nobis: O holy Socrates, pray for us.’ L

N^o 214. Monday, November 5.

——— Perierunt tempora longi Servitii ———

Juv. Sat. 3. v. 124.

A long dependence in an hour is lost. DRYDEN.

I Did some time ago lay before the world the unhappy condition of the trading part of mankind, who suffer by want of punctuality, in the dealings of persons above them; but there is a set of men who are much more the objects of compassion than even those, and these are the Dependents on great men, whom they are pleased to take under their protection as such as are to share in their friendship and favour. These indeed, as well from the homage that is accepted from them, as the hopes which are given to them, are become a sort of creditors; and these debts, being debts of honour, ought, according to the accustomed maxim, to be first discharged.

When I speak of Dependents, I would not be understood to mean those who are worthless in themselves, or who, without any call, will press into the company of their betters. Nor, when I speak of Patrons, do I mean those who either have it not in their power, or have no obligation to assist their friends; but I speak of such

such leagues where there is power and obligation on the one part, and merit and expectation on the other.

The division of Patron and Client, may, I believe, include a third of our nation; the want of merit and real worth in the Client, will strike out about ninety-nine in an hundred of these; and the want of ability in Patrons, as many of that kind. But however, I must beg leave to say, that he who will take up another's time and fortune in his service, though he has no prospect of rewarding his merit towards him, is as unjust in his dealings as he who takes up goods of a Tradesman without intention or ability to pay him. Of the few of the class which I think fit to consider, there are not two in ten who succeed, insomuch that I know a man of good sense who put his son to a Black-smith, though an offer was made him of his being received as a page to a man of Quality. There are not more cripples come out of the wars than there are from those great services; some through discontent lose their speech, some their memories, others their senses or their lives; and I seldom see a man thoroughly discontented, but I conclude he has had the favour of some great man. I have known of such as have been for twenty years together within a month of a good employment, but never arrived at the happiness of being possessed of any thing.

There is nothing more ordinary, than that a man who is got into a considerable station, shall

shall immediately alter his manner of treating all his friends, and from that moment he is to deal with you as if he were your fate. You are no longer to be consulted, even in matters which concern yourself; but your Patron is of a species above you, and a free communication with you is not to be expected. This perhaps may be your condition all the while he bears office, and when that is at an end, you are as intimate as ever you were, and he will take it very ill if you keep the distance he prescribed you towards him in his grandeur. One would think this should be a behaviour a man could fall into with the worst grace imaginable; but they who know the world have seen it more than once. I have often, with secret pity, heard the same man who has professed his abhorrence against all kind of passive behaviour, lose minutes, hours, days, and years in a fruitless attendance on one who had no inclination to befriend him. It is very much to be regarded, that the Great have one particular privilege above the rest of the world, of being slow in receiving impressions of kindness, and quick in taking offence. The elevation above the rest of mankind, except in very great minds, makes men so giddy, that they do not see after the same manner they did before: Thus they despise their own friends, and strive to extend their interest to new pretenders. By this means it often happens, that when you come to know how you lost such an employment, you will find the man who got it never dreamed of it; but, forsooth, forsooth, he was to be surpris'd into it, or perhaps solicited to receive it. Upon such occasions as these a man may perhaps grow out of humour; if you are so, all mankind will fall in with the Patron, and you are an humourist and untractable if you are capable of being sour at a disappointment: But it is the same thing, whether you do or do not resent ill usage, you will be used after the same manner; as some good mothers will be sure to whip their children until they cry, and then whip them for crying.

There are but two ways of doing any thing with great people, and those are by making yourself either considerable or agreeable: The former is not to be attained but by finding a way to live without them, or concealing that you want them; the latter is only by falling into their taste and pleasures: This is of all the employments in the world the most servile, except it happens to be of your own natural humour. For to be agreeable to another, especially if he be above you, is not to be possessed of such qualities and accomplishments as should render you agreeable in yourself, but such as make you agreeable in respect to him. An imitation of his faults, or a compliance, if not subservience, to his vices, must be the measures of your conduct.

When it comes to that, the unnatural state a man lives in, when his Patron pleases, is ended; and his guilt and complaisance are objected to him, though the man who rejects him for his vices was not only his partner but seducer. Thus the Client (like a young woman who has given up the innocence which made her charming) has not only lost his time, but also the virtue which could render him capable of resenting the injury which is done him.

It would be endless to recount the tricks of turning you off from themselves to persons who have less power to serve you, the art of being sorry for such an unaccountable accident in your behaviour, that such a one (who, perhaps, has never heard of you) opposes your advancement; and if you have any thing more than ordinary in you, you are flattered with a whisper, that it is no wonder people are so slow in doing for a man of your talents and the like.

After all this treatment, I must still add the pleasantest inscience of all, which I have once or twice seen; to wit, that when a silly rogue has thrown away one part in three of his life in unprofitable attendance, it is taken wonderfully ill that he withdraws, and is resolved to employ the rest for himself.

When we consider these things, and reflect upon so many honest natures (which one, who makes observation of what passes, may have seen) that have miscarried by such sort of applications, it is too melancholy a scene to dwell upon; therefore I shall take another opportunity to discourse of good Patrons, and distinguish such as have done their duty to those who have depended upon them, and were not able able to act without their favour. Worthy Patrons are like Plato's guardian Angels, who are always doing good to their wards; but negligent Patrons are like Epicurus's Gods, that lie lolling on the clouds, and instead of blessings pour down storms and tempests on the heads of those that are offering incense to them. T

N^o 215 Tuesday, November 6.

—Ingenuas didicisse fideliter artes
Emollit mores, nec finit esse feros.

Ovid. Ep. 9. l. 2. de Ponto v. 47.

Ingenuous arts, where they an entrance find,
 Soften the manners, and subdue the mind.

I Consider an human Soul without education like marble in the quarry, which shews none of its inherent beauties, until the skill of the polisher fetches out the colours, makes the surface shine, and discovers every ornamental cloud, spot, and vein that runs through the body of it. Education, after the same manner, when it works upon a noble mind, draws out to view every latent virtue and perfection, which without such helps are never able to make their appearance.

If my reader will give me leave to change the allusion so soon upon him, I shall make use of the same instance to illustrate the force of education, which Aristotle has brought to explain his doctrine of substantial forms, when he tells us that a statue lies hid in a block of marble; and that the art of the Statuary only clears away the superfluous matter, and removes the rubbish. The figure is in the stone, the Sculptor only finds it. What sculpture is to a block of Marble, education is to an human Soul. The Philosopher, the Saint, or the Hero, the wise, the good, or the great man, very often lie hid and concealed in a plebeian, which a proper education might have dis-interred, and have brought to light. I am therefore much delighted with reading the accounts of savage nations, and with contemplating those virtues which are wild and uncultivated; to see courage exerting itself in fierceness, resolution in obstinacy, wisdom in cunning, patience in fullness and despair.

Men's passions operate variously, and appear in different kinds of actions, according as they are more or less rectified and swayed by reason. When one hears of Negroes, who upon the death of their masters, or upon changing their service, hang themselves upon the next tree, as it frequently happens in our American plantations, who can forbear admiring their fidelity, though it expresses itself in so dreadful a manner? What might not that savage greatness of Soul which appears in these poor wretches on many occasions, be raised to, were it rightly cultivated? And what colour of excuse can there be for the contempt with which we treat this part

part of our species? That we should not put them upon the common foot of humanity, that we should only set an insignificant fine upon the man who murders them; nay, that we should, as much as in us lies, cut them off from the prospects of happiness in another world as well as in this, and deny them that which we look upon as the proper means for attaining it?

Since I am engaged on this subject, I cannot forbear mentioning a story which I have lately heard, and which is so well attested, that I have no manner of reason to suspect the truth of it. I may call it a kind of wild Tragedy that passed about twelve years ago at Saint Christophers, one of our British leeward islands. The Negroes who were the persons concerned in it, were all of them the slaves of a Gentleman who is now in England.

This Gentleman among his Negroes had a young woman, who was looked upon as a most extraordinary Beauty by those of her own complexion. He had at the same time two young fellows who were likewise Negroes and slaves, remarkable for the comeliness of their persons, and for the friendship which they bore to one another. It unfortunately happened that both of them fell in love with the female Negro above-mentioned, who would have been very glad to have taken either of them for her husband, provided they could agree between themselves which should be the man. But they were both so passionately in love with her, that neither of them could think of giving her up to his rival; and at the same time were so true to one another, that neither of them would think of gaining her without his friend's consent. The torments of these two Lovers were the discourse of the family to which they belonged, who could not forbear observing the strange complication of passions which perplexed the hearts of the poor Negroes, that often dropped expressions of the uneasiness they underwent, and how impossible it was for either of them ever to be happy.

After a long struggle between love and friendship, truth and jealousy, they one day took a walk together into a wood, carrying their mistress along with them: Where, after abundance of lamentations, they stabbed her to the heart, of which she immediately died. A slave who was at his work not far from the place where this astonishing piece of cruelty was committed, hearing the shrieks of the dying person, ran to see what was the occasion of them. He there discovered the woman lying dead upon the ground, with the two Negroes on each side of her, kissing the dead corps, weeping over it, and beating their breasts in the utmost agonies of grief and despair. He immediately ran to the English family with the news of what he had seen; who upon coming to the place saw the woman dead, and the two Negroes expiring by her with wounds they had given themselves.

We see in this amazing instance of barbarity, what strange disorders are bred in the minds of those men whose passions are not regulated by virtue, and disciplined by reason. Though the action

action which I have recited is in itself full of guilt and horror, it proceeded from a temper of mind which might have produced very noble fruits, had it been informed and guided by a suitable Education.

It is therefore an unspeakable blessing to be born in those parts of the world where wisdom and knowledge flourish; though it must be confessed, there are, even in these parts, several poor uninstructed persons who are but little above the inhabitants of those nations of which I have been here speaking; as those who have had the advantage of a more liberal Education, rise above one another by several different degrees of perfection. For to return to our statue in the block of marble, we see it sometimes only begun to be chipped, sometimes rough-hewn, and but just sketched into an human figure; sometimes we see the man appearing distinctly in all his limbs and features, sometimes we find the figure wrought up to a great elegance, but seldom meet with any to which the hand of a Phidias or Praxiteles could not give several nice touches and finishings.

Discourses of morality, and reflexions upon human nature, are the best means we can make use of to improve our minds, and gain a true knowledge of ourselves, and consequently to recover our Souls out of the vice, ignorance, and prejudice, which naturally cleave to them. I have all along professed myself in this Paper a promoter of these great ends; and I flatter myself that I do from day to day contribute something thing to the polishing of men's minds: at least my design is laudable, whatever the execution may be. I must confess I am not a little encouraged in it by many letters which I receive from unknown hands, in approbation of my endeavours; and must take this opportunity of returning my thanks to those who write them, and excusing myself for not inserting several of them in my Papers, which I am sensible would be a very great ornament to them. Should I publish the praises which are so well penned, they would do honour to the persons who write them, but my publishing of them would I fear be a sufficient instance to the world that I did not deserve them. C

Wednesday,

N^o 216 Wednesday, November 7.

*Siquidem herclè possis, nil prius, neque fortius ;
 Verùm si incipies, neque perficies naviter,
 Atque, ubi pati non poteris, cum nemo expetet,
 Infectâ pace, ultrò ad eam venies, indicans
 Te amare, & ferre non posse : Actum est, ilicet, Peristi : eludet, ubi te victum senserit.*

Ter. Eun. Act 1. Sc. 1.

If indeed you can keep to your resolution, you will act a noble and a manly part : but if, when you have set about it, your courage fails you, and you make a voluntary submission, acknowledging the violence of your passion, and your inability to hold out any longer ; all is over with you ; you are undone, and may go hang yourself ; she will insult over you, when she finds you her slave.

To the SPECTATOR.

S I R,

THIS is to inform you, that Mr. Freeman had no sooner taken coach, but his Lady was taken with a terrible fit of the vapours, which it is feared will make her miscarry, if not endanger her life ; therefore, dear Sir, if you know of any receipt that is good against this fashionable reigning distemper, be pleased to communicate it for the good of the public, and you will oblige

Yours,

A. NOEWILL.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

THE uproar was so great as soon as I had read the Spectator concerning Mrs. Freeman, that after many revolutions in her temper, of raging, swooning, railing, fainting, pitying herself, and reviling her husband, upon an accidental coming-in of a neighbouring Lady (who says she has writ to you also) she had nothing left for it but to fall in a fit. I had the honour to read the Paper to her, and have a pretty good command of my countenance and temper on such occasions; and soon found my historical name to be Tom Meggot in your writings, but concealed myself until I saw how it affected Mrs. Freeman. She looked frequently at her husband, as often at me; and she did not tremble as she filled tea, until she came to the circumstance of Armstrong's writing out a piece of Tully for an Opera tune: Then she burst out, She was exposed, she was deceived, she was wronged and abused. The tea-cup was thrown in the fire; and without taking vengeance on her spouse, she said of me, that I was a pretending Coxcomb, a medler that knew not what it was to interpose in so nice an affair as between a man and his wife. To which Mr. Freeman, Madam, were I less fond of you than I am, I should not have taken this way of writing to the SPECTATOR, to inform a woman whom God and Nature has placed under my direction, with what I request of her; but since you are so indiscreet as not to take

‘ take the hint which I gave you in that Paper, ‘ I must tell you, Madam, in so many words, ‘ that you have for a long and tedious space of ‘ time acted a part unsuitable to the sense you ‘ ought to have of the subordination in which ‘ you are placed. And I must acquaint you ‘ once for all, that the fellow without, ah Tom !
‘ (here the footman entered and answered ‘ Madam) Sirrah, do not you know my voice ?
‘ look upon me when I speak to you : I say,
‘ Madam, this fellow here is to know of me ‘ myself, whether I am at leisure to see company ‘ or not. I am from this hour master of this ‘ house ; and my business in it, and every where ‘ else, is to behave myself in such a manner, as ‘ it shall be hereafter an honour to you to bear ‘ my name ; and your pride, that you are the ‘ delight, the darling and ornament of a man ‘ of honour, useful and esteemed by his friends ;
‘ and I no longer one that has buried some merit ‘ in the world, in compliance to a froward ‘ humour which has grown upon an agreeable ‘ woman by his indulgence. Mr. Freeman ended ‘ this with a tenderness in his aspect and a down‘ cast eye, which shewed he was extremely ‘ moved at the anguish he saw her in ; for she ‘ sat swelling with passion, and her eyes firmly ‘ fixed on the fire ; when I, fearing he would ‘ lose all again, took upon me to provoke her ‘ out of that amiable sorrow she was in, to fall ‘ upon me ; upon which I said very seasonably ‘ for my friend, that indeed Mr. Freeman was ‘ become the common talk of the town ; and ‘ that nothing was so much a jest, as when it ‘ was said in company Mr. Freeman has promised ‘ to come to such a place. Upon which the ‘ good Lady turned her softness into downright ‘ rage, and threw the scalding tea-kettle upon ‘ your humble servant; flew into the middle of ‘ the room, and cried out she was the unfor‘ tunatest of all women: Others kept family ‘ dissatisfactions for hours of privacy and retire‘ ment: No apology was to be made to her, no ‘ expedient to be found, no previous manner of ‘ breaking what was amiss in her; but all the ‘ world was to be acquainted with her errors, ‘ without the least admonition. Mr. Freeman

‘ was going to make a softening speech, but I ‘ interposed; look you, Madam, I have nothing ‘ to say to this matter, but you ought to consider ‘ you are now past a chicken; this humour, ‘ which was well enough in a girl, is insuf‘ ferable in one of your motherly character.
‘ With that she lost all patience, and flew di‘ rectly at her husband’s periwig. I got her ‘ in my arms, and defended my friend: He ‘ making signs at the same time that it was too ‘ much; I beckoning, nodding, and frowning ‘ over her shoulder, that he was lost if he did ‘ not persist. In this manner she flew round ‘ and round the room in a moment, until the ‘ Lady I spoke of above and servants entered; ‘ upon which she fell on a couch as breathless.
‘ I still kept up my friend; but he, with a very ‘ silly air, bid them bring the coach to the door,
‘ and we went off, I forced to bid the coachman ‘ drive

‘ drive on. We were no sooner come to my lodgings, but all his wife’s relations came to inquire after him; and Mrs. Freeman’s mother writ a note, wherein she thought never to have seen this day, and so forth.

‘ In a word, Sir, I am afraid we are upon a thing we have no talents for; and I can observe already, my friend looks upon me rather as a man that knows a weakness of him that he is ashamed of, than one who has rescued him from slavery. Mr. SPECTATOR, I am but a young fellow, and if Mr. Freeman submits, I shall be looked upon as an incendiary, and never get a wife as long as I breathe. He has indeed sent word home he shall lie at Hamstead to-night; but I believe fear of the first onset after this rupture has too great a place in this resolution. Mrs. Freeman has a very pretty sister; suppose I delivered him up, and articulated with the mother for her, bringing him home. If he has not courage to stand it, (you are a great casuist) is it such an ill thing to bring myself off, as well as I can? What makes me doubt my man, is, that I find he thinks it reasonable to expostulate at least with her; and Captain SENTRY will tell you, if you let your Orders be disputed, you are no longer a Commander. I wish you could advise me how to get clear of this business handsomely.

Yours,

Tom Meggot.

T

Thursday,

N^o 217 Thursday, November 8.

— *Tunc femina simplex,
Et pariter toto repetitur clamor ab antro.*

Juv. Sat. 6. v. 326.

Then, unrestrain'd by rules of decency,
Th' assembled Females raise a general cry.

I Shall entertain my reader to-day with some Letters from my correspondents.

The first of them is the description of a Club, whether real or imaginary, I cannot determine; but am apt to fancy, that the writer of it, whoever she is, has formed a kind of nocturnal Orgie out of her own fancy: Whether this be so or not, her Letter may conduce to the amendment of that kind of persons who are represented in it, and whose characters are frequent enough in the world.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

‘ I N some of your first Papers you were pleased ‘ to give the public a very diverting account ‘ of several Clubs and nocturnal assemblies; but ‘ I am a member of a society which has wholly ‘ escaped your notice, I mean a club of She-‘ romps. We take each a hackney-coach, and ‘ meet once a week in a large upper chamber, ‘ which we hire by the year for that purpose; ‘ our

‘ our landlord and his family, who are quiet ‘ people, constantly contriving to be abroad on ‘ our Club-night. We are no sooner come to‘ gether, than we throw off all that modesty ‘ and reservedness with which our Sex are ‘ obliged to disguise themselves in public places.
‘ I am not able to express the pleasure we enjoy ‘ from ten at night until four in the morning, ‘ in being as rude as you men can be for your ‘ lives. As our play runs high, the room is ‘ immediately filled with broken fans, torn petti‘ coats, lappets or head-dresses, flounces, fur‘ belows, garters, and working-aprons. I had ‘ forgot to tell you at first, that besides the ‘ coaches we come in ourselves, there is one ‘ which stands always empty to carry off our ‘ dead men, for so we call all those fragments ‘ and tatters with which the room is strewed,
‘ and which we pack up together in bundles
‘ and put into the aforesaid coach: It is no ‘ small diversion for us to meet the next night ‘ at some member’s chamber, where every one ‘ is to pick out what belonged to her from ‘ this confused bundle of silks, stuffs, laces, and ‘ ribbands. I have hitherto given you an ac‘ count of our diversion on ordinary Club-nights; ‘ but must acquaint you further, that once a ‘ month we demolish a Prude, that is, we get ‘ some queer formal creature in among us, and ‘ unrig her in an instant. Our last month’s ‘ Prude was so armed and fortified in whale‘ bone and buckram, that we had much ado ‘ to come at her; but you would have died with ‘ laugh-

‘ laughing to have seen how the sober awkward ‘ thing looked when she was forced out of her ‘ intrenchments. In short, Sir, it is impossible ‘ to give you a true notion of our sport, un‘ less you would come one night amongst us;
 ‘ and though it be directly against the rules ‘ of our Society to admit a male visitant, we ‘ repose so much confidence in your silence ‘ and taciturnity, that it was agreed by the ‘ whole Club, at our last meeting, to give you ‘ entrance for one night as a Spectator.

I am your humble servant,

Kitty Termagant.

P. S. We shall demolish a Prude next Thursday.

Though I thank Kitty for her kind offer, I do not at present find in myself any inclination to venture my person with her and her romping companions. I should regard myself as a second Claudius intruding on the mysterious rites of the Bona Dea, and should apprehend being demolished as much as the Prude.

The following Letter comes from a Gentleman, whose taste I find is much too delicate to endure the least advance towards romping. I may perhaps hereafter improve upon the hint he has given me, and make it the subject of a whole Spectator; in the mean time take it as it follows in his own words.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

‘ IT is my misfortune to be in love with a ‘ young creature who is daily committing ‘ faults, which though they give me the utmost ‘ uneasiness,

‘ uneasiness, I know not how to reprove her ‘ for, or even acquaint her with. She is pretty, ‘ dresses well, is rich, and good-humoured; but ‘ either wholly neglects, or has no notion of ‘ that which polite people have agreed to distin‘ guish by the name of Delicacy. After our ‘ return from a walk the other day she threw ‘ herself into an elbow-chair, and professed be‘ fore a large company, that “ She was all over ‘ in a sweat.” She told me this afternoon “ that ‘ her stomach ached;” and was complaining ‘ yesterday at dinner of something that “ stuck ‘ in her teeth.” I treated her with a basket of ‘ fruit last summer, which she eat so very gree‘ dily, as almost made me resolve never to see ‘ her more. In short, Sir, I begin to tremble ‘ whenever I see her about to speak or move.
 ‘ as she does not want sense, if she takes these ‘ hints I am happy; if not, I am more than ‘ afraid, that these things which shock me even ‘ in the behaviour of a mistress, will appear in‘ supportable in that of a wife.

I am, Sir,

Yours, &c.

My next Letter comes from a correspondent whom I cannot but very much value, upon the account which she gives of herself.

MR. SPECTATOR,

‘ I Am happily arrived at a state of tranquillity, ‘ which few people envy, I mean that of an ‘ old Maid; therefore being wholly unconcerned
 VOL. III. T in

‘ in all that medley of follies which our Sex is ‘ apt to contract from their silly fondness of ‘ yours, I read your ralleries on us without pro‘ vocation. I can say with Hamlet, —— Man delights not me,

 Nor Woman neither ——

‘ therefore, dear Sir, as you never spare your ‘ own Sex, do not be afraid of reproving what is ‘ ridiculous in ours, and you will oblige at least ‘ one woman, who is

Your humble servant,

Susanna Frost.

MR. SPECTATOR,

‘ I Am wife to a Clergyman, and cannot help ‘ thinking that in your tenth or tithe character ‘ of womankind you meant myself, therefore I ‘ have no quarrel against you for the other nine ‘ characters.

Your humble servant,

X

A. B.

Friday,

 N^o 218 Friday, November 9.

Quid de quoque viro, & cui dicas, sæpe caveto.

Hor. Ep. 18. l. i. v. 68.

— Have a care
Of whom you talk, to whom, and what, and where.
POOLY.

I Happened the other day, as my way is, to strole into a little Coffee-house beyond Aldgate; and as I sat there, two or three very plain sensible men were talking of the SPECTATOR. One said, he had that morning drawn the great Benefit-ticket; another wished he had; but a third shook his head and said, it was pity that the writer of that Paper was such a sort of man, that it was no great matter whether he had it or no. He is, it seems, said the good man, the most extravagant creature in the world; has run through vast sums, and yet been in continual want; a man, for all he talks so well of oeconomy, unfit for any of the offices of life by reason of his profuseness. It would be an unhappy thing to be his wife, his child, or his friend; and yet he talks as well of those duties of life as any one. Much reflexion has brought me to so easy a contempt for every thing which is false, that this heavy accusation gave me no manner of uneasiness; but at the same time it threw me into deep thought upon the subject of Fame in general ; and I could not but pity such as were so weak, as to value what the common people say out of their own talkative temper to the advantage or diminution of those whom they mention, without being moved either by malice or good-will. It will be too long to expatiate upon the sense all mankind have of Fame, and the inexpressible pleasure which there is in the approbation of worthy men, to all who are capable of worthy actions ; but methinks one may divide the general word Fame into three different species, as it regards the different orders of mankind who have any thing to do with it. Fame therefore may be divided into glory, which respects the Hero ; reputation, which is preserved by every Gentleman ; and credit, which must be supported by every Tradesman. These possessions in Fame are dearer than life to these characters of men, or rather are the life of those characters. Glory, while the Hero pursues great and noble enterprizes, is impregnable ; and all the assailants of his renown do but shew their pain and impatience of its brightness, without throwing the least shade upon it. If the foundation of an high name be virtue and service, all that is offered against it is but rumour, which is too short-lived to stand up in competition with Glory, which is everlasting.

Reputation, which is the portion of every man who would live with the elegant and knowing part of mankind, is as stable as Glory, if it be as well founded ; and the common cause of human

man

man society is thought concerned when we hear a man of good behaviour calumniated: Besides which, according to a prevailing custom amongst us, every man has his defence in his own arm: and reproach is soon checked, put out of countenance, and overtaken by disgrace.

The most unhappy of all men, and the most exposed to the malignity or wantonness of the common voice, is the Trader. Credit is undone in whispers. The Tradesman's wound is received from one who is more private and more cruel than the ruffian with the lanthorn and dagger. The manner of repeating a man's name,—As; 'Mr. Cass, Oh! do you leave your money at 'his shop? Why, do you know Mr. Searoom? 'He is indeed a general Merchant.' I say, I have seen, from the iteration of a man's name, hiding one thought of him, and explaining what you hide, by saying something to his advantage when you speak, a Merchant hurt in his credit; and him who, every day he lived, literally added to the value of his native country, undone by one who was only a burden and a blemish to it. Since every body who knows the world is sensible of this great evil, how careful ought a man to be in his language of a Merchant? It may possibly be in the power of a very shallow creature to lay the ruin of the best family in the most opulent city; and the more so, the more highly he deserves of his country; that is to say, the farther he places his wealth out of his hands, to draw home that of another climate.

In this case an ill word may change plenty into want, and by a rash sentence a free and generous fortune may in a few days be reduced to beggary. How little does a giddy prater imagine, that an idle phrase to the disfavour of a Merchant, may be as pernicious in the consequence, as the forgery of a deed to bar an inheritance would be to a Gentleman? Land stands where it did before a Gentleman was calumniated, and the state of a great action is just as it was before calumny was offered to diminish it, and there is time, place and occasion, expected to unravel all that is contrived against those characters; but the Trader who is ready only for probable demands upon him, can have no armour against the inquisitive, the malicious, and the envious, who are prepared to fill the cry to his dishonour. Fire and sword are slow engines of destruction, in comparison of the babblers in the case of the Merchant.

For this reason I thought it an imitable piece of humanity of a Gentleman of my acquaintance, who had great variety of affairs, and used to talk with warmth enough against Gentlemen by whom he thought himself ill dealt with; but he would never let any thing be urged against a Merchant (with whom he had any difference) except in a court of justice. He used to say, that to speak ill of a Merchant, was to begin his suit with judgment and execution. One cannot, I think, say more on this occasion, than to repeat, that the merit of the Merchant is above that of all other subjects; for while he is untouched in his credit, credit, his hand-writing is a more portable coin for the service of his fellow-citizens, and his word the gold of Ophir to the country wherein he resides. T

N^o 219 Saturday, November 10.

Vix ea nostra voco——

Ovid. Met. l. 13. v. 141.

These I scarce call our own.

THERE are but few men, who are not ambitious of distinguishing themselves in the nation or country where they live, and of growing considerable among those with whom they converse. There is a kind of grandeur and respect, which the meanest and most insignificant part of mankind endeavour to procure in the little circle of their friends and acquaintance. The poorest mechanic, nay the man who lives upon common alms, gets him his set of admirers, and delights in that superiority which he enjoys over those who are in some respects beneath him. This ambition, which is natural to the Soul of man, might methinks receive a very happy turn; and, if it were rightly directed, contribute as much to a person's advantage, as it generally does to his uneasiness and disquiet.

I shall therefore put together some thoughts on this subject, which I have not met with in other writers; and shall set them down as they have occurred to me, without being at the pains to connect or methodise them.

All superiority and pre-eminence that one man can have over another, may be reduced to the notion of Quality, which, considered at large, is either that of fortune, body, or mind. The first is that which consists in birth, title, or riches; and is the most foreign to our natures, and what we can the least call our own of any of the three kinds of Quality. In relation to the body, Quality arises from health, strength, or beauty; which are nearer to us, and more a part of ourselves than the former. Quality, as it regards the mind, has its rise from knowledge or virtue; and is that which is more essential to us, and more intimately united with us than either of the other two.

The Quality of fortune, though a man has less reason to value himself upon it than on that of the body or mind, is however the kind of Quality which makes the most shining figure in the eye of the world.

As virtue is the most reasonable and genuine source of honour, we generally find in titles an intimation of some particular merit that should recommend men to the high stations which they possess. Holiness is ascribed to the Pope; majesty to Kings; serenity or mildness of temper to Princes; excellence or perfection to Ambassadors; grace to Archbishops; honour to Peers; worship or venerable behaviour to Magistrates; and and reverence, which is of the same import as the former, to the inferior Clergy.

In the founders of great families, such attributes of honour are generally correspondent with the virtues of the person to whom they are applied; but in the descendents they are too often the marks rather of grandeur than of merit. The stamp and denomination still continues, but the intrinsic value is frequently lost.

The death-bed shews the emptiness of titles in a true light. A poor dispirited sinner lies trembling under the apprehensions of the state he is entering on; and is asked by a grave attendant how his Holiness does? Another hears himself addressed to under the title of Highness or Excellency, who lies under such mean circumstances of mortality as are the disgrace of human nature. Titles at such a time look rather like insults and mockery than respect.

The truth of it is, Honours are in this world under no regulation; true Quality is neglected, virtue is oppressed, and vice triumphant. The last day will rectify this disorder, and assign to every one a station suitable to the dignity of his character; ranks will be then adjusted, and precedence set right.

Methinks we should have an ambition, if not to advance ourselves in another world, at least to preserve our post in it, and outshine our inferiors in virtue here, that they may not be put above us in a state which is to settle the distinction for eternity.

Men in Scripture are called 'strangers and 'sojourners upon earth,' and life a 'pilgrimage'. Several heathen, as well as christian Authors, under the same kind of metaphor, have represented the world as an Inn, which was only designed to furnish us with accommodations in this our passage. It is therefore very absurd to think of setting up our rest before we come to our journey's end, and not rather to take care of the reception we shall there meet, than to fix our thoughts on the little conveniences and advantages which we enjoy one above another in the way to it.

Epictetus makes use of another kind of allusion, which is very beautiful, and wonderfully proper to incline us to be satisfied with the post in which Providence has placed us. We are here, says he, as in a Theatre, where every one has a part allotted to him. The great duty which lies upon a man is to act his part in perfection. We may indeed say, that our part does not suit us, and that we could act another better. But this (says the Philosopher) is not our business. All that we are concerned in is to excel in the part which is given us. If it be an improper one, the fault is not in us, but in him who has cast our several parts, and is the great disposer of the drama.

The part that was acted by this Philosopher himself was but a very indifferent one, for he lived and died a slave. His motive to contentment in this particular, receives a very great enforcement from the above-mentioned consideration, sideration, if we remember that our parts in the other world will be new cast, and that mankind will be there ranged in different stations of superiority and pre-eminence, in proportion as they have here excelled one another in virtue, and performed in their several posts of life the duties which belong to them.

There are many beautiful passages in the little apocryphal book, entitled, The Wisdom of Solomon, to set forth the vanity of Honour, and the like temporal blessings which are in so great repute among men, and to comfort those who have not the possession of them. It represents in very warm and noble terms this advancement of a good man in the other world, and the great surprise which it will produce among those who are his superiors in this. ‘ Then shall the righteous man stand in great boldness before the face of such as have afflicted him, and made no account of his labours. When they see it, they shall be troubled with terrible fear, and shall be amazed at the strangeness of his salvation, so far beyond all that they looked for. And they repenting and groaning for anguish of spirit, shall say within themselves; ‘ This is he whom we had sometime in derision, and a proverb of reproach. We fools accounted his life madness, and his end to be without honour. How is he numbered among the children of God, and his lot is among the Saints!’

If the reader would see the description of a life that is passed away in vanity and among the shadows shadows of pomp and greatness, he may see it very finely drawn in the same place. In the mean time, since it is necessary in the present constitution of things, that order and distinction should be kept in the world, we should be happy, if those who enjoy the upper stations in it, would endeavour to surpass others in virtue, as much as in rank, and by their humanity and condescension make their superiority easy and acceptable to those who are beneath them; and if, on the contrary, those who are in meaner posts of life, would consider how they may better their condition hereafter, and by a just deference and submission to their superiors, make them happy in those blessings with which Providence has thought fit to distinguish them. C

N^o 220 Monday, November 12.

Rumoresque ferit varios—— Virg. Æn. 12. v. 228.

A thousand rumours spreads.

S I R,

‘ WHY will you apply to my Father for ‘ my love? I cannot help it if he will ‘ give you my Person; but I assure you it is ‘ not in his power, nor even in my own, to ‘ give you my Heart. Dear Sir, do but consider ‘ the ill consequence of such a match; you are ‘ fifty-five, I twenty-one. You are a man of business,

' business, and mightily conversant in arithme' tic and making calculations; be pleased there' fore to consider what proportion your spirits
 ' bear to mine, and when you have made a
 ' just estimate of the necessary decay on one ' side, and the redundance on the other, you ' will act accordingly. This perhaps is such ' language as you may not expect from a young ' Lady; but my happiness is at stake, and I ' must talk plainly. I mortally hate you; and
 ' so, as you and my Father agree, you may ' take me or leave me: But if you will be so ' good as never to see me more, you will for ' ever oblige,

Sir,

Your most humble servant,

HENRIETTA.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

' THERE are so many artifices and modes
 ' of false wit, and such a variety of hu' mour discovers itself among its votaries, that ' it would be impossible to exhaust so fertile
 ' a subject, if you would think fit to resume it.
 ' The following instances may, if you think fit,
 ' be added by way of appendix to your discourses
 ' on that subject.

' That feat of poetical activity mentioned by
 ' Horace, of an Author who could compose two ' hundred verses while he stood upon one leg,
 ' has been imitated (as I have heard) by a ' modern writer; who priding himself on the ' hurry

‘ hurry of his invention, thought it no small ‘ addition to his fame to have each piece minuted ‘ with the exact number of hours or days it cost ‘ him in the composition. He could taste no ‘ praise until he had acquainted you in how short ‘ space of time he had deserved it; and was not ‘ so much led to an ostentation of his art, as of ‘ his dispatch.

————— *Accipe, si vis,
 Accipiam tabulas; detur nobis locus, hora,
 Custodes: videamus uter plus scribere possit.*

Hor. Sat. 4. l. i. v. 14.

Here’s pen and ink, and time, and place; let’s try,
 Who can write most, and fastest, you or I.

CREECH.

‘ This was the whole of his ambition; and ‘ therefore I cannot but think the flights of this ‘ rapid Author very proper to be opposed to ‘ those laborious nothings which you have ob‘ served were the delight of the German Wits, ‘ and in which they so happily got rid of such a ‘ tedious quantity of their time.

‘ I have known a Gentleman of another turn ‘ of humour, who, despising the name of an ‘ Author, never printed his works, but con‘ tracted his talent, and by the help of a very ‘ fine diamond which he wore on his little finger, ‘ was a considerable Poet upon glass. He had ‘ a very good epigrammatic wit; and there was ‘ not a parlour or tavern-window where he visited ‘ or dined for some years, which did not receive ‘ some sketches or memorials of it. It was his ‘ misfortune at last to lose his genius and his ‘ ring

ring to a sharper at play, and he has not attempted to make a verse since.

But of all contractions or expedients for wit, I admire that of an ingenious projector whose book I have seen. This virtuoso being a Mathematician, has, according to his taste, thrown the art of poetry into a short problem, and contrived tables by which any one without knowing a word of grammar or sense, may, to his great comfort, be able to compose, or rather to erect Latin verses. His tables are a kind of poetical logarithms, which being divided into several squares, and all inscribed with so many incoherent words, appear to the eye somewhat like a fortune-telling screen. What a joy must it be to the unlearned operator to find that these words being carefully collected and writ down in order according to the problem, start of themselves into hexameter and pentameter verses? A friend of mine, who is a student in Astrology, meeting with this book, performed the operation, by the rules there set down; he shewed his verses to the next of his acquaintance, who happened to understand Latin; and being informed they described a tempest of wind, very luckily prefixed them, together with a translation, to an Almanac he was just then printing, and was supposed to have foretold the last great storm.

I think the only improvement beyond this, would be that which the late Duke of Buckingham mentioned to a stupid pretender to Poetry, as the project of a Dutch mechanic, viz.

' viz. a mill to make verses. This being the ' most compendious method of all which have ' yet been propos'd, may deserve the thoughts of ' our modern Virtuosi who are employ'd in new ' discoveries for the public good: and it may ' be worth the while to consider, whether in ' an Island where few are content without being ' thought Wits, it will not be a common be' nefit, that wit as well as labour should be made
 ' cheap.

I am, Sir,

Your humble servant, &c.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

' I Often dine at a Gentleman's house, where
 ' there are two young Ladies in themselves
 ' very agreeable, but very cold in their beha' viour, because they understand me for a person
 ' that is to break my mind, as the phrase is, very ' suddenly to one of them. But I take this ' way to acquaint them, that I am not in love
 ' with either of them, in hopes they will use
 ' me with that agreeable freedom and indif' ference which they do all the rest of the ' world, and not to drink to one another only,
 ' but sometimes cast a kind look, with their
 ' service to,

Sir,

Your humble servant,

Mr.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

I Am a young Gentleman, and take it for a piece of good-breeding to pull off my hat when I see any thing peculiarly charming in any woman, whether I know her or not. I take care that there is nothing ludicrous or arch in my manner, as if I were to betray a woman into a salutation by way of jest or humour; and yet except I am acquainted with her, I find she ever takes it for a rule, that she is to look upon this civility and homage I pay to her supposed merit, as an impertinence or forwardness which she is to observe and neglect. I wish, Sir, you would settle the business of salutation; and please to inform me how I shall resist the sudden impulse I have to be civil to what gives an idea of merit; or tell these creatures how to behave themselves in return to the esteem I have for them. My affairs are such, that your decision will be a favour to me, if it be only to save the unnecessary expence of wearing out my hat so fast as I do at present.

I am, Sir,

Yours, T. D.

P. S. There are some that do know me, and will not bow to me. T

N^o 221 Tuesday, November 13.

——— Ab Ovo

Usque ad Mala ———

Hor. Sat. 3. l. i. v. 6.

From eggs, which first are set upon the board,
To apples ripe, with which it last is stor'd.

WHEN I have finished any of my Speculations, it is my method to consider which of the ancient Authors have touched upon the subject that I treat of. By this means I meet with some celebrated thought upon it, or a thought of my own expressed in better words, or some similitude for the illustration of my subject. This is what gives birth to the Motto of a Speculation, which I rather choose to take out of the Poets than the Prose-writers, as the former generally give a finer turn to a thought than the latter, and by couching it in few words, and in harmonious numbers, make it more portable to the memory.

My reader is therefore sure to meet with at least one good line in every Paper, and very often finds his imagination entertained by a hint that awakens in his memory some beautiful passage of a classic Author.

It was a Saying of an ancient Philosopher, which I find some of our writers have ascribed to Queen Elizabeth, who perhaps might have taken occasion casion to repeat it, 'that a good face is a letter of recommendation.' It naturally makes the beholders inquisitive into the person who is the owner of it, and generally prepossesses them in his favour. A handsome Motto has the same effect. Besides that it always gives a supernumerary beauty to a Paper, and is sometimes in a manner necessary when the writer is engaged in what may appear a paradox to vulgar minds, as it shews that he is supported by good authorities, and is not singular in his opinion.

I must confess, the Motto is of little use to an unlearned reader, for which reason I consider it only as 'a word to the wise.' But as for my unlearned friends, if they cannot relish the Motto, I take care to make provision for them in the body of my Paper. If they do not understand the sign that is hung out, they know very well by it, that they may meet with entertainment in the house; and I think I was never better pleased than with a plain man's compliment, who, upon his friend's telling him that he would like the Spectator much better if he understood the Motto, replied, 'that good wine needs no bush.'

I have heard of a couple of preachers in a country town, who endeavoured which should outshine one another, and draw together the greatest congregation. One of them being well versed in the Fathers, used to quote every now and then a Latin sentence to his illiterate hearers, who it seems found themselves so edified by it, that they flocked in greater numbers to this learned man than to his rival. The other finding his congregation mouldering every Sunday, and hearing at length what was the occasion of it, resolved to give his parish a little Latin in his turn; but being unacquainted with any of the Fathers, he digested into his sermons the whole book of Quæ Genus, adding however such explications to it as he thought might be for the benefit of his people. He afterwards entered upon As in præfenti, which he converted in the same manner to the use of his parishioners. This in a very little time thickened his audience, filled his church, and routed his antagonist.

The natural love to Latin, which is so prevalent in our common people, makes me think that my Speculations fare never the worse among them for that little scrap which appears at the head of them; and what the more encourages me in the use of quotations in an unknown tongue, is, that I hear the Ladies, whose approbation I value more than that of the whole learned world, declare themselves in a more particular manner pleased with my Greek Mottos.

Designing this day's work for a dissertation upon the two extremities of my Paper, and having already dispatched my Motto, I shall, in the next place, discourse upon those single capital letters, which are placed at the end of it, and which have afforded great matter of speculation to the curious. I have heard various conjectures upon this subject. Some tell us that C is the mark of those Papers that are written by the Clergyman, though others ascribe them to the Club

Club in general: That the Papers marked with R were written by my friend Sir ROGER: That L signifies the Lawyer, whom I have described in my second Speculation; and that T stands for the Trader or Merchant: But the letter X, which is placed at the end of some few of my Papers, is that which has puzzled the whole town, as they cannot think of any name which begins with that letter, except Xenophon and Xerxes, who can neither of them be supposed to have had any hand in these Speculations.

In answer to these inquisitive Gentlemen, who have many of them made inquiries of me by letter, I must tell them the reply of an ancient Philosopher, who carried something hidden under his cloke. A certain acquaintance desiring him to let him know what it was he covered so carefully; 'I cover it, says he, on purpose that you should not know.' I have made use of these obscure marks for the same purpose. They are, perhaps, little amulets or charms to preserve the Paper against the fascination and malice of evil eyes; for which reason I would not have my reader surpris'd, if hereafter he sees any of my Papers marked with a Q, a Z, a Y, an &c, or with the word Abracadabra.

I shall, however, so far explain myself to the reader, as to let him know that the letters C, L, and X, are cabalistical, and carry more in them than it is proper for the world to be acquainted with. Those who are versed in the philosophy of Pythagoras, and swear by the Tetractys, that is the number four, will know very well that the number ten, which is signified by the letter X, (and which has so much perplexed the town) has in it many particular powers; that it is called by platonic writers the complete number; that one, two, three and four put together make up the number ten; and that ten is all. But these are not mysteries for ordinary readers to be let into. A man must have spent many years in hard study before he can arrive at the knowledge of them.

We had a rabbinical Divine in England, who was Chaplain to the Earl of Essex in Queen Elizabeth's time, that had an admirable head for secrets of this nature. Upon his taking the Doctor of Divinity's degree, he preached before the University of Cambridge, upon the First verse of the First chapter of the First book of Chronicles, in which, says he, you have the three following words, Adam, Seth, Enosh.

He divided this short text into many parts, and by discovering several mysteries in each word, made a most learned and elaborate discourse. The name of this profound preacher was Doctor Alabaster, of whom the reader may find a more particular account in Doctor Fuller's book of English Worthies. This instance will, I hope, convince my readers that there may be a great deal of fine writing in the capital letters which bring up the rear of my Paper, and give them some satisfaction in that particular. But as for the full explication of these matters, I must refer them to time, which discovers all things, C

N^o 222 Wednesday, November 14.

Cur alter fratrum cessare, & ludere, & ungi, Præferat Herodis palmetis pinguibus —

Hor. Ep. 2. l. 2. v. 183.

Why, of two brothers, one his pleasure loves,
Prefers his sports to Herod's fragrant groves.

CREECH.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

THERE is one thing I have often looked for in your Papers, and have as often wondered to find myself disappointed; the rather, because I think it a subject every way agreeable to your design, and by being left unattempted by others, seems reserved as a proper employment for you; I mean a Disquisition, from whence it proceeds, that men of the brightest parts, and most comprehensive genius, completely furnished with talents for any province in human affairs; such as by their wise lessons of Oeconomy to others have made it evident, that they have the justest notions of life, and of true sense in the conduct of it——: From what unhappy contradictory cause it proceeds, that persons thus finished by nature and by art, should so often fail in the management of that which they so well understand, and want the address to make a ‘ right application of their own rules. This is ‘ certainly a prodigious inconsistency in beha‘ viour, and makes much such a figure in ‘ morals as a monstrous birth in naturals, with ‘ this difference only, which greatly aggravates ‘ the wonder, that it happens much more fre‘ quently; and what a blemish does it cast upon ‘ wit and learning in the general account of ‘ the world? And in how disadvantageous a ‘ light does it expose them to the busy class ‘ of mankind, that there should be so many ‘ instances of persons who have so conducted ‘ their lives in spite of these transcendent advan‘ tages, as neither to be happy in themselves, ‘ nor useful to their friends; when every body ‘ sees it was intirely in their own power to be ‘ eminent in both these characters? For my ‘ part, I think there is no reflexion more asto‘ nishing, than to consider one of these Gentle‘ men spending a fair fortune, running in every ‘ body’s debt without the least apprehension ‘ of a future reckoning, and at last leaving not ‘ only his own children, but possibly those of ‘ other people, by his means, in starving cir‘ cumstances; while a fellow whom one would ‘ scarce suspect to have a human Soul, shall per‘ haps raise a vast estate out of nothing, and be ‘ the founder of a family capable of being very ‘ considerable in their country, and doing many ‘ illustrious services to it. That this observation ‘ is just, experience has put beyond all dispute.

‘ But though the fact be so evident and glaring, ‘ yet the causes of it are still in the dark; which ‘ makes

' makes me persuade myself, that it would be ' no unacceptable piece of entertainment to the ' town, to enquire into the hidden sources of so
' unaccountable an evil.

I am, Sir,

Your most humble servant.

What this correspondent wonders at, has been matter of admiration ever since there was any such thing as human life. Horace reflects upon this inconsistency very agreeably in the character of Tigellius, whom he makes a mighty pretender to Oeconomy, and tells you, you might one day hear him speak the most philosophic things imaginable concerning being contented with a little, and his contempt of every thing but mere necessities, and in half a week after spend a thousand pound. When he says this of him with relation to expence, he describes him as unequal to himself in every other circumstance of life. And indeed, if we consider lavish men carefully, we shall find it always proceeds from a certain incapacity of possessing themselves, and finding enjoyment in their own minds. Mr. Dryden has expressed this very excellently in the character of Zimri.

A man so various, that he seem'd to be
Not one, but all mankind's epitome.
Stiff in opinion, always in the wrong,
Was every thing by starts, and nothing long;
But in the course of one revolving moon,
Was chymist, fidler, statesman, and buffoon.
Then all for women, painting, rhiming, drinking,
Besides ten thousand freaks that died in thinking.
Blest

Blest madman, who could every hour employ
In something new to wish or to enjoy !
In squand'ring wealth was his peculiar art,
Nothing went unrewarded but desert.

This loose state of the Soul hurries the extravagant from one pursuit to another; and the reason that his expences are greater than another's, is, that his wants are also more numerous. But what makes so many go on in this way to their lives end, is, that they certainly do not know how contemptible they are in the eyes of the rest of mankind, or rather, that indeed they are not so contemptible as they deserve. Tully says, it is the greatest of wickedness to lessen your paternal estate. And if a man would thoroughly consider how much worse than banishment it must be to his child, to ride by the estate which should have been his, had it not been for his father's injustice to him, he would be smitten with the reflexion more deeply than can be understood by any but one who is a father. Sure there can be nothing more afflicting, than to think it had been happier for his son to have been born of any other man living than himself.

It is not perhaps much thought of, but it is certainly a very important lesson, to learn how to enjoy ordinary life, and to be able to relish your Being without the transport of some passion, or gratification of some appetite. For want of this capacity, the world is filled with whetters, tipplers, cutters, sippers, and all the numerous train of those who, for want of thinking, are forced forced to be ever exercising their feeling or tasting. It would be hard on this occasion to mention the harmless smokers of tobacco and takers of snuff.

The flower part of mankind, whom my correspondent wonders should get estates, are the more immediately formed for that pursuit: They can expect distant things without impatience, because they are not carried out of their way either by violent passion or keen appetite to any thing. To men addicted to delights, business is an interruption; to such as are cold to delights, business is an entertainment. For which reason it was said to one who commended a dull man for his application, 'No thanks to him; if he had no business, he would have nothing to do.'

T

N^o 223 Thursday, November 15.

O suavis anima! qualem te dicam bonam Antebac fuisse, tales cum sint reliquæ!

Phædr. Fab. i. l. 3. v. 5.

O sweet Soul! how good must you have been heretofore, when your remains are so delicious!

WHEN I reflect upon the various fate of those multitudes of ancient writers who flourished in Greece and Italy, I consider time as an immense ocean, in which many noble Authors are intirely swallowed up, many very much much shattered and damaged, some quite disjointed and broken into pieces, while some have wholly escaped the common wreck; but the number of the last is very small.

Apparent vari nantes in gurgite vasto.

Virg. Æn. i. v. 122.

One here and there floats on the vast abyss.

Among the mutilated Poets of antiquity, there is none whose fragments are so beautiful as those of Sappho. They give us a taste of her way of writing, which is perfectly conformable with that extraordinary character we find of her, in the remarks of those great Critics who were conversant with her works when they were intire. One may see by what is left of them, that she followed Nature in all her thoughts, without descending to those little points, conceits, and turns of wit with which many of our modern Lyrics are so miserably infected. Her Soul seems to have been made up of Love and Poetry: She felt the passion in all its warmth, and described it in all its symptoms. She is called by ancient Authors the tenth Muse; and by Plutarch is compared to Cacus the son of Vulcan, who breathed out nothing but flame. I do not know, by the character that is given of her works, whether it is not for the benefit of mankind that they are lost. They were filled with such bewitching tenderness and rapture, that it might have been dangerous to have given them a reading.

An inconstant Lover, called Phaon, occasioned great calamities to this poetical Lady. She fell desperately in love with him, and took a voyage into Sicily, in pursuit of him, he having withdrawn himself thither on purpose to avoid her. It was in that island, and on this occasion, she is supposed to have made the Hymn to Venus, with a translation of which I shall present my reader. Her Hymn was ineffectual for the procuring that happiness which she prayed for in it. Phaon was still obdurate, and Sappho so transported with the violence of her passion, that she was resolved to get rid of it at any price.

There was a promontory in Acarmania called Leucaté, on the top of which was a little Temple dedicated to Apollo. In this Temple it was usual for despairing Lovers to make their vows in secret, and afterwards to fling themselves from the top of the precipice into the sea, where they were sometimes taken up alive. This place was therefore called, The Lover's Leap; and whether or no the fright they had been in, or the resolution that could push them to so dreadful a remedy, or the bruises which they often received in their fall, banished all the tender sentiments of love, and gave their spirits another turn; those who had taken this leap were observed never to relapse into that passion. Sappho tried the cure, but perished in the experiment.

After having given this short account of Sappho so far as it regards the following Ode, I shall subjoin the translation of it as it was sent me by a friend, whose admirable Pastorals and

Winter-

Winter-Piece have been already so well received. The reader will find in it that pathetic simplicity which is so peculiar to him, and so suitable to the Ode he has here translated. This Ode in the Greek (besides those beauties observed by Madam Dacier) has several harmonious turns in the words, which are not lost in the English. I must farther add, that the translation has preserved every image and sentiment of Sappho, notwithstanding it has all the ease and spirit of an original. In a word, if the Ladies have a mind to know the manner of writing practised by the so much celebrated Sappho, they may here see it in its genuine and natural beauty, without any foreign or affected ornaments.

AN HYMN to VENUS.

I.

O Venus, beauty of the skies,
To whom a thousand Temples rise,
Gayly false in gentle smiles,
Full of love-perplexing wiles ;
O Goddess! from my heart remove
The wasting cares and pains of Love.

II.

If ever thou hast kindly heard
A song in soft distress preferr'd, Propitious to my tuneful vow,
O gentle Goddess! hear me now.
Descend thou bright, immortal guest,
In all thy radiant charms confest.

III. Thou

III.

Thou once didst leave almighty Jove,
 And all the golden roofs above :
 The carr thy wanton sparrows drew,
 Hov'ring in air they lightly flew ;
 As to my bow'r they wing'd their way,
 I saw their quiv'ring pinions play.

IV.

The birds dismiss'd (while you remain)
 Bore back their empty carr again :
 Then you, with looks divinely mild,
 In ev'ry heav'nly feature smil'd,
 And ask'd, what new complaints I made,
 And why I call'd you to my aid ?

V.

What frenzy in my bosom rag'd,
 And by what cure to be asswag'd ?
 What gentle youth I would allure,
 Whom in my artful toils secure ?
 Who does thy tender heart subdue,
 Tell me, my Sappho, tell me who ?

VI.

Tho' now he shuns thy longing arms,
 He soon shall court thy slighted charms ;
 Tho' now thy off'rings he despise,
 He soon to thee shall sacrifice ;
 Tho' now he freeze, he soon shall burn,
 And be thy victim in his turn.

VII.

Celestial visitant, once more
 Thy needful presence I implore !
 In pity come and ease my grief,
 Bring my distemper'd soul relief,
 Favour thy suppliant's hidden fires,
 And give me all my heart desires.

Madam

Madam Dacier observes, there is something very pretty in that circumstance of this Ode, wherein Venus is described as sending away her chariot upon her arrival at Sappho's lodgings, to denote that it was not a short transient visit which she intended to make her. This Ode was preserved by an eminent Greek critic, who inserted it intire in his works, as a pattern of perfection in the structure of it.

Longinus has quoted another Ode of this great Poetess, which is likewise admirable in its kind, and has been translated by the same hand with the foregoing one. I shall oblige my reader with it in another Paper. In the mean while, I cannot but wonder, that these two finished pieces have never been attempted before by any of our own countrymen. But the truth of it is, the compositions of the ancients, which have not in them any of those unnatural witticisms that are the delight of ordinary readers, are extremely difficult to render into another tongue, so as the beauties of the original may not appear weak and faded in the translation. C

 N^o 224 Friday, November 16.

—Fulgente trahit constrictos Gloria curru
Non minus ignotos generosis— Hor. Sat. 6. l. 1. v. 23.

—Glory's shining chariot swiftly draws
 With equal whirl the noble and the base.

CREECH.

IF we look abroad upon the great multitude of mankind, and endeavour to trace out the principles of action in every individual, it will, I think, seem highly probable that Ambition runs through the whole species, and that every man in proportion to the vigour of his complexion is more or less actuated by it. It is indeed no uncommon thing to meet with men, who, by the natural bent of their inclinations, and without the discipline of philosophy, aspire not to the heights of power and grandeur; who never set their hearts upon a numerous train of clients and dependencies, nor other gay appendages of greatness; who are contented with a competency, and will not molest their tranquillity to gain an abundance: But it is not therefore to be concluded that such a man is not ambitious: His desires may have cut out another channel, and determined him to other pursuits; the motive however may be still the same; and in these cases likewise the man may be equally pushed on with the desire of distinction.

Though the pure consciousness of worthy actions, abstracted from the views of popular applause, be to a generous mind an ample reward, yet the desire of Distinction was doubtless implanted in our natures as an additional incentive to exert ourselves in virtuous excellence.

This passion indeed, like all others, is frequently perverted to evil and ignoble purposes; so that we may account for many of the excellencies and follies of life upon the same innate principle, to wit, the desire of being remarkable: For this, as it has been differently cultivated by education, study and converse, will bring forth suitable effects as it falls in with an ingenuous disposition, or a corrupt mind; it does accordingly express itself in acts of magnanimity or selfish cunning, as it meets with a good or a weak understanding. As it has been employed in embellishing the mind, or adorning the outside, it renders the man eminently praise-worthy or ridiculous. Ambition therefore is not to be confined only to one passion or pursuit; for as the same humours, in constitutions otherwise different, affect the body after different manners, so the same aspiring principle within us sometimes breaks forth upon one object, sometimes upon another.

It cannot be doubted, but that there is as great desire of Glory in a ring of Wrestlers or Cudgel-players, as in any other more refined competition for superiority: No man that could avoid it, would would ever suffer his head to be broken but out of a principle of Honour. This is the secret spring that pushes them forward; and the superiority which they gain above the undistinguished many, does more than repair those wounds they have received in the combat. It is Mr. Waller's opinion, that Julius Cæsar, had he not been master of the Roman Empire, would in all probability have made an excellent wrestler.

Great Julius, on the mountains bred,
A flock perhaps or herd had led;
He that the world subdu'd, had been
But the best wrestler on the green.

That he subdued the world, was owing to the accidents of art and knowledge; had he not met with those advantages, the same sparks of emulation would have kindled within him, and prompted him to distinguish himself in some enterprise of a lower nature. Since therefore no man's lot is so unalterably fixed in this life, but that a thousand accidents may either forward or disappoint his advancement, it is, methinks, a pleasant and inoffensive speculation, to consider a great man as divested of all the adventitious circumstances of fortune, and to bring him down in one's imagination to that low station of life, the nature of which bears some distant resemblance to that high one he is at present possessed of. Thus one may view him exercising in miniature those talents of nature, which being drawn out by education to their full length, enable him for the discharge of some important employment.

On the other hand, one may raise uneducated merit to such a pitch of greatness as may seem equal to the possible extent of his improved capacity.

Thus nature furnishes a man with a general appetite of Glory, education determines it to this or that particular object. The desire of Distinction is not, I think, in any instance more observable than in the variety of outfides and new appearances, which the modish part of the world are obliged to provide, in order to make themselves remarkable; for any thing glaring and particular, either in behaviour or apparel, is known to have this good effect, that it catches the eye, and will not suffer you to pass over the person so adorned without due notice and observation. It has likewise, upon this account, been frequently resented as a very great slight, to leave any Gentleman out of a lampoon or satire, who has as much right to be there as his neighbour, because it supposes the person not eminent enough to be taken notice of. To this passionate fondness for Distinction are owing various frolicsome and irregular practices, as fallying out into nocturnal exploits, breaking of windows, singing of catches, beating the Watch, getting drunk twice a day, killing a great number of horses; with many other enterprises of the like fiery nature: For certainly many a man is more rakish and extravagant than he would willingly be, were there not others to look on and give their approbation.

One very common, and at the same time the most absurd Ambition that ever shewed itself in human nature, is that which comes upon a man with experience and old age, the season when it might be expected he should be wisest; and therefore it cannot receive any of those lessening circumstances which do, in some measure, excuse the disorderly ferments of youthful blood: I mean the passion for getting money, exclusive of the character of the provident father, the affectionate husband, or the generous friend. It may be remarked, for the comfort of honest poverty, that this desire reigns most in those who have but few good qualities to recommend them. This is a weed that will grow in a barren soil. Humanity, good-nature, and the advantages of a liberal education, are incompatible with avarice. It is strange to see how suddenly this abject passion kills all the noble sentiments and generous ambitions that adorn human nature; it renders the man who is overrun with it a peevish and cruel master, a severe parent, an unfociable husband, a distant and mistrustful friend. But it is more to the present purpose to consider it as an absurd passion of the heart, rather than as a vicious affection of the mind. As there are frequent instances to be met with of a proud humility, so this passion, contrary to most others, affects applause, by avoiding all show and appearance; for this reason it will not sometimes endure even the common decencies of apparel. 'A covetous ‘sooth his vanity by contradicting him.’ Love, and the desire of Glory, as they are the most natural, so they are capable of being refined into the most delicate and rational passions. It is true, the wise man who strikes out of the secret paths of a private life, for honour and dignity, allured by the splendor of a court, and the unfelt weight of public employment, whether he succeeds in his attempts or no, usually comes near enough to this painted greatness to discern the dawning; he is then desirous of extricating himself out of the hurry of life, that he may pass away the remainder of his days in tranquillity and retirement.

It may be thought then but common prudence in a man not to change a better state for a worse, nor ever to quit that which he knows he shall take up again with pleasure; and yet if human life be not a little moved with the gentle gales of hopes and fears, there may be some danger of its stagnating in an unmanly indolence and security. It is a known story of Domitian, that after he had possessed himself of the Roman Empire, his desires turned upon catching flies. Active and masculine spirits in the vigour of youth neither can nor ought to remain at rest: If they debar themselves from aiming at a noble object, their desires will move downwards, and they will feel themselves actuated by some low and abject passion. Thus if you cut off the top branches of a tree, and will not suffer it to grow any higher, it will not therefore cease to grow, but will quickly shoot shoot out at the bottom. The man indeed who goes into the world only with the narrow views of self-interest, who catches at the applause of an idle multitude, as he can find no solid contentment at the end of his journey, so he deserves to meet with disappointments in his way; but he who is actuated by a noble principle, whose mind is so far enlarged as to take in the prospect of his country's good, who is enamoured with that praise which is one of the fair attendants of virtue, and values not those acclamations which are not seconded by the impartial testimony of his own mind; who repines not at the low station which Providence has at present allotted him, but yet would willingly advance himself by justifiable means to a more rising and advantageous ground; such a man is warmed with a generous emulation; it is a virtuous movement in him to wish and to endeavour that his power of doing good may be equal to his will.

The man who is fitted out by Nature, and sent into the world with great abilities, is capable of doing great good or mischief in it. It ought therefore to be the care of education to infuse into the untainted youth early notices of justice and honour, that so the possible advantages of good parts may not take an evil turn, nor be perverted to base and unworthy purposes. It is the business of Religion and Philosophy not so much to extinguish our passions, as to regulate and direct them to valuable well-chosen objects: When these have pointed out to us which course we may lawfully steer, it is no harm to set out all our sail; if the storms and tempests of adversity should rise upon us, and not suffer us to make 'the haven where we would be,' it will however prove no small consolation to us in these circumstances, that we have neither mistaken our course, nor fallen into calamities of our own procuring.

Religion therefore (were we to consider it no farther than as it interposes in the affairs of this life) is highly valuable, and worthy of great veneration; as it settles the various pretensions, and otherwise interfering interests of mortal men, and thereby consults the harmony and order of the great community; as it gives a man room to play his part, and exert his abilities; as it animates to actions truly laudable in themselves, in their effects beneficial to society; as it inspires rational ambition, correct love, and elegant desire.

N^o 225 Saturday, November 17.

Nullum numen abest, si sit Prudentia —

Juv. Sat. 10. v. 365.

Prudence supplies the want of ev'ry God.

I Have often thought if the minds of men were laid open, we should see but little difference between that of the wise man and that of the fool. There are infinite reveries, numberless extravagancies, and a perpetual train of vanities which pass through both. The great difference is, that the first knows how to pick and cull his thoughts for conversation, by suppressing some, and communicating others; whereas the other lets them all indifferently fly out in words. This sort of Discretion, however, has no place in private conversation between intimate friends. On such occasions the wisest men very often talk like the weakest; for indeed the talking with a friend is nothing else but thinking aloud.

Tully has therefore very justly exposed a precept delivered by some ancient writers, that a man should live with his enemy in such a manner, as might leave him room to become his friend; and with his friend in such a manner, that if he became his enemy, it should not be in his power to hurt him. The first part of this rule, which regards our behaviour towards an enemy, is indeed very reasonable, as well as very prudential; but the latter part of it which regards our behaviour towards a friend, favours more of Cunning than of Discretion, and would cut a man off from the greatest pleasures of life, which are the freedoms of conversation with a bosom friend. Besides that when a friend is turned into an enemy, and, (as the son of Sirach calls him) a bewrayer of Secrets, the world is just enough to accuse the perfidiousness of the friend, rather than the indiscretion of the person who confided in him.
of

Discretion does not only shew itself in words, but in all the circumstances of action; and is like an under-agent of Providence, to guide and direct us in the ordinary concerns of life.

There are many more shining qualities in the mind of man, but there is none so useful as Discretion; it is this indeed which gives a value to all the rest, which sets them at work in their proper times and places, and turns them to the advantage of the person who is possessed of them. Without it learning is pedantry, and wit impertinence; virtue itself looks like weakness; the best parts only qualify a man to be more sprightly in errors, and active to his own prejudice.

Nor does Discretion only make a man the master of his own parts, but of other mens. The discreet man finds out the talents of those he converses with, and knows how to apply them to proper uses. Accordingly if we look into

into particular communities and divisions of men, we may observe that it is the discreet man, not the witty, nor the learned, nor the brave, who guides the conversation, and gives measures to the society. A man with great talents, but void of Discretion, is like Polyphemus in the Fable, strong and blind; endued with an irresistible force, which for want of sight is of no use to him.

Though a man has all other perfections, and wants Discretion, he will be of no great consequence in the world; but if he has this single talent in perfection, and but a common share of others, he may do what he pleases in his particular station of life.

At the same time that I think Discretion the most useful talent a man can be master of, I look upon Cunning to be the accomplishment of little, mean, ungenerous minds. Discretion points out the noblest ends to us, and pursues the most proper and laudable methods of attaining them: Cunning has only private selfish aims, and sticks at nothing which may make them succeed. Discretion has large and extended views, and, like a well-formed eye, commands a whole horizon: Cunning is a kind of short-sightedness, that discovers the minutest objects which are near at hand, but is not able to discern things at a distance. Discretion, the more it is discovered, gives a greater authority to the person who possesses it: Cunning, when it is once detected, loses its force, and makes a man incapable of bringing about even those events events which he might have done, had he passed only for a plain man. Discretion is the perfection of Reason, and a guide to us in all the duties of life; Cunning is a kind of Instinct, that only looks out after our immediate interest and welfare. Discretion is only found in men of strong sense and good understanding: Cunning is often to be met with in brutes themselves, and in persons who are but the fewest removes from them. In short, Cunning is only the mimic of Discretion, and may pass upon weak men, in the same manner as vivacity is often mistaken for wit, and gravity for wisdom.

The cast of mind which is natural to a discreet man, makes him look forward into Futurity, and consider what will be his condition millions of ages hence, as well as what it is at present. He knows that the misery or happiness which are reserved for him in another world, lose nothing of their reality by being placed at so great a distance from him. The objects do not appear little to him because they are remote. He considers that those pleasures and pains which lie hid in Eternity, approach nearer to him every moment, and will be present with him in their full weight and measure, as much as those pains and pleasures which he feels at this very instant. For this reason he is careful to secure to himself that which is the proper happiness of his nature, and the ultimate design of his Being. He carries his thoughts to the end of every action, and considers the most distant, as well as the most immediate effects of it. He supercedes every little prospect prospect of gain and advantage which offers itself here, if he does not find it consistent with his views of an Hereafter. In a word, his hopes are full of Immortality, his schemes are large and glorious, and his conduct suitable to one who knows his true interest, and how to pursue it by proper methods.

I have, in this essay upon Discretion, considered it both as an accomplishment and as a virtue, and have therefore described it in its full extent; not only as it is conversant about worldly affairs, but as it regards our whole existence; not only as it is the guide of a mortal creature, but as it is in general the director of a reasonable Being. It is in this light that Discretion is represented by the Wise man, who sometimes mentions it under the name of Discretion, and sometimes under that of Wisdom. It is indeed (as described in the latter part of this Paper) the greatest Wisdom, but at the same time in the power of every one to attain. Its advantages are infinite, but its acquisition easy; or to speak of her in the words of the apocryphal writer whom I quoted in my last Saturday's Paper, 'Wisdom is glorious, and never ' fadeth away, yet she is easily seen of them that ' love her, and found of such as seek her. She ' preventeth them that desire her, in making ' herself first known unto them. He that seek' eth her early, shall have no great travel: For
' he shall find her sitting at his doors. To think
' therefore upon her is perfection of Wisdom,
' and who so watcheth for her shall quickly be
' without

‘ without care. For she goeth about seeking ‘ such as are worthy of her, sheweth herself ‘ favourably unto them in the ways, and meet‘ eth them in every thought.’ C

N^o 226 Monday, November 19.

— Mutum est pictura poema.

A picture is a poem without words.

I HAVE very often lamented and hinted my sorrow in several Speculations, that the art of Painting is made so little use of to the improvement of our manners. When we consider that it places the action of the person represented in the most agreeable aspect imaginable, that it does not only express the passion or concern as it sits upon him who is drawn, but has under those features the height of the Painter’s imagination, what strong images of virtue and humanity might we not expect would be instilled into the mind from the labours of the Pencil? This is a Poetry which would be understood with much less capacity, and less expence of time, than what is taught by Writings; but the use of it is generally perverted, and that admirable skill prostituted to the basest and most unworthy ends. Who is the better man for beholding the most beautiful Venus, the best wrought Bacchanal, the images of sleeping Cupids, languishing languishing Nymphs, or any of the representations of Gods, Goddeffes, Demigods, Satyrs, Polyphemes, Sphinxes, or Fawns? But if the virtues and vices, which are sometimes pretended to be represented under such draughts, were given us by the Painter in the characters of real life, and the persons of men and women whose actions have rendered them laudable or infamous; we should not see a good history-piece without receiving an instructive lecture. There needs no other proof of this truth, than the testimony of every reasonable creature who has seen the Cartons in her Majesty's gallery at Hampton-court: These are representations of no less actions than those of our blessed Saviour and his Apostles. As I now sit and recollect the warm images which the admirable Raphael has raised, it is impossible even from the faint traces in one's memory of what one has not seen these two years, to be unmoved at the horror and reverence which appear in the whole assembly when the mercenary man fell down dead; at the amazement of the man born blind, when he first receives sight; or at the graceless indignation of the Sorcerer, when he is struck blind. The Lame, when they first find strength in their feet, stand doubtful of their new vigour. The heavenly Apostles appear acting these great things, with a deep sense of the infirmities which they relieve, but no value of themselves who administer to their weakness. They know themselves to be but instruments; and the generous distress they are painted in when

when divine honours are offered to them, is a representation in the most exquisite degree of the beauty of Holiness. When St. Paul is preaching to the Athenians, with what wonderful art are almost all the different tempers of mankind represented in that elegant audience? You see one credulous of all that is said, another wrapt up in deep suspense, another saying there is some reason in what he says, another angry that the Apostle destroys a favourite opinion which he is unwilling to give up, another wholly convinced and holding out his hands in rapture, while the generality attend, and wait for the opinion of those who are of leading characters in the assembly. I will not pretend so much as to mention that Chart on which is drawn the appearance of our blessed Lord after his Resurrection. Present authority, late suffering, humility and majesty, despotic command, and divine love, are at once seated in his celestial aspect. The figures of the eleven Apostles are all in the same passion of admiration, but discover it differently according to their characters. Peter receives his Master's orders on his knees with an admiration mixed with a more particular attention: The two next with a more open ecstasy, though still constrained by the awe of the divine Presence: The beloved Disciple, whom I take to be the right of the two first figures, has in his countenance wonder drowned in love; and the last personage, whose back is towards the spectators, and his side towards the Presence, one would fancy to be St. Thomas, as abashed by the conscience of his former diffidence; which perplexed concern it is possible Raphael thought too hard a task to draw but by this acknowledgment of the difficulty to describe it.

The whole work is an exercise of the highest piety in the Painter; and all the touches of a religious mind are expressed in a manner much more forcible than can possibly be performed by the most moving eloquence. These invaluable pieces are very justly in the hands of the greatest and most pious Sovereign in the world; and cannot be the frequent object of every one at their own leisure: But as an Engraver is to the Painter what a Printer is to an Author, it is worthy her Majesty's name, that she has encouraged that noble Artist, Monsieur Dorigny, to publish these works of Raphael. We have of this Gentleman a piece of the Transfiguration, which, I think, is held a work second to none in the world.

It seems it would be ridiculous in our people of condition after their large bounties to Foreigners of no name or merit, should they overlook this occasion of having, for a trifling subscription, a work which it is impossible for a man of sense to behold, without being warmed with the noblest sentiments that can be inspired by love, admiration, compassion, contempt of this world, and expectation of a better.

It is certainly the greatest honour we can do our Country, to distinguish strangers of merit who apply to us with modesty and diffidence, which generally accompanies merit.

No opportunity of this kind ought to be neglected; and a modest behaviour should alarm us to examine whether we do not lose something excellent under that disadvantage in the possessor of that quality. My skill in Paintings, where one is not directed by the passion of the pictures, is so inconsiderable, that I am in very great perplexity when I offer to speak of any performances of Painters, of landscapes, buildings, or single figures. This makes me at a loss how to mention the pieces which Mr. Boul exposes to sale by auction on Wednesday next in Shandois-Street: But having heard him commended by those who have bought of him heretofore for great integrity in his dealing, and overheard him himself (though a laudable Painter) say, nothing of his own was fit to come into the room with those he had to sell, I feared I should lose an occasion of serving a man of worth, in omitting to speak of his auction.

T

N^o 227 Tuesday, November 20.

ὦ μοι ἐγὼ τι πάθω; τί ὁ δῦσσο; οὐχ ὑπανέεις;
 Τὰν βαίταν ἀποδὺς εἰς κύματα τήνα ἀλεύμαι
 Ὀπερ τῶς θύνης σκωπιάζεται Ὀλπις ὁ χειρεύς.
 Κῆκα μὴ ποθάνω, τό γε μὴν τεον ἄδν τέτυκται.

Theocr.

IN my last Thursday's Paper I made mention of a place called The Lover's Leap, which I find has raised a great curiosity among several of my correspondents. I there told them that this Leap was used to be taken from a promontory of Leucas. This Leucas was formerly a part of Acarmania, being joined to it by a narrow neck of land, which the sea has by length of time overflowed and washed away; so that at present Leucas is divided from the continent, and is a little island in the Ionian sea. The promontory of this island, from whence the Lover took his leap, was formerly called Leucate. If the reader has a mind to know both the island and the promontory by their modern titles, he will find in this map the ancient island of Leucas under the Name of Saint Mauro, and the ancient promontory of Leucate under the name of The Cape of Saint Mauro.

Since I am engaged thus far in antiquity, I must observe that Theocritus in the motto prefixed to my Paper, describes one of his despairing

ing Shepherds addressing himself to his mistress after the following manner: ' Alas! What will become of me! Wretch that I am! Will you not hear me? I will throw off my clothes, and take a leap into that part of the sea which is so much frequented by Olphis the fisherman. And though I should escape with my life, I know you will be pleased with it.' I shall leave it with the Critics to determine whether the place, which this Shepherd so particularly points out, was not the above-mentioned Leucate, or at least some other Lover's leap, which was supposed to have had the same effect. I cannot believe, as all the interpreters do, that the Shepherd means nothing farther here than that he would drown himself, since he represents the issue of his leap as doubtful, by adding, that if he should escape with life, he knows his mistress would be pleased with it; which is according to our interpretation, that she would rejoice any way to get rid of a Lover who was so troublesome to her.

After this short preface, I shall present my reader with some Letters which I have received upon this subject. The first is sent me by a Physician.

MR. SPECTATOR,

THE Lover's Leap, which you mention in your 223d Paper, was generally, I believe, a very effectual cure for Love, and not only for Love, but for all other evils. In short, Sir, I am afraid it was such a leap as
 ' that

‘ that which Hero took to get rid of her passion ‘ for Leander. A man is in no danger of break‘ ing his heart, who breaks his neck to prevent ‘ it. I know very well the wonders which an‘ cient Authors relate concerning this Leap; and ‘ in particular, that very many persons who tried ‘ it, escaped not only with their lives but their ‘ limbs. If by this means they got rid of their ‘ Love, though it may in part be ascribed to the ‘ reasons you give for it; why may not we ‘ suppose that the cold bath into which they ‘ plunged themselves, had also some share in their ‘ cure? A leap into the sea or into any creek ‘ of salt waters, very often gives a new motion ‘ to the spirits, and a new turn to the blood;
‘ for which reason we prescribe it in distempers ‘ which no other medicine will reach. I could ‘ produce a quotation out of a very venerable ‘ Author, in which the frenzy produced by ‘ Love, is compared to that which is produced ‘ by the biting of a mad dog. But as this ‘ comparison is a little too coarse for your Paper, ‘ and might look as if it were cited to ridicule
‘ the Author who has made use of it; I shall ‘ only hint at it, and desire you to consider ‘ whether, if the frenzy produced by the two ‘ different causes be of the same nature, it may ‘ not very properly be cured by the same means.

I am, Sir,

your most humble servant,

and well-wisher,

ÆSCULAPIUS.

MR. SPECTATOR,

I Am a young woman crossed in Love. My story is very long and melancholy. To give you the heads of it: A young Gentleman, after having made his applications to me for three years together, and filled my head with a thousand dreams of happiness, some few days since married another. Pray tell me in what part of the world your promontory lies, which you call The Lover's Leap, and whether one may go to it by land? But, alas, I am afraid it has lost its virtue, and that a woman of our times would find no more relief in taking such a leap, than in singing an hymn to Venus. So that I must cry out with Dido in Dryden's Virgil, Ah! cruel heaven, that made no cure for love!

Your disconsolate servant,

ATHENAIS.

MISTER SPICTATUR,

MY heart is so full of loves and passions for Mrs. Gwinifrid, and she is so pettish and over-run with cholers against me, that if I had the good happiness to have my dwelling (which is placed by my creat crandfather upon the pottom of an hill) no farther distance but twenty mile from the Lofer's Leap, I would indeed endeavour to preak my neck upon it on purpose. Now, good Mr. SPICTATUR

of

‘ of Great Britain, you must know it there is ‘ in Caernarvanshire a very pig mountain, the ‘ clory of all Wales which is named Penmain- ‘ maure, and you must also know, it is no creat ‘ journey on foot from me; but the road is stony ‘ and bad for shoes. Now, there is upon the ‘ forehead of this mountain a very high rock, ‘ (like a parish steeple) that cometh a huge deal ‘ over the sea; so when I am in my melan‘ cholies, and I do throw myself from it, I do ‘ desire my fery good friend to tell me in his Spic- ‘ tatur, if I shall be cure of my grievous loses; ‘ for there is the sea clear as glass, and as green ‘ as the leek: Then likewise if I be drown and ‘ preak my neck, if Mrs. Gwinifrid will not ‘ lose me afterwards. Pray be speedy in your ‘ answers, for I am in creat haste, and it is my ‘ tesires to do my pusiness without loss of time.
 ‘ I remain with cordial affections, your ever ‘ losing friend,

Davyth ap Shenkyn.

P. S. ‘ My Law-suits have brought me to ‘ London, but I have lost my causes; and so ‘ have made my resolutions to go down and ‘ leap before the frosts begin; for I am apt to ‘ take colds.

Ridicule, perhaps, is a better expedient against Love than sober advice, and I am of opinion, that Hudibras and Don Quixote may be as effectual to cure the extravagancies of this passion, as any of the old Philosophers. I shall therefore publish very speedily the translation of a little Greek manuscript, which is sent me by a learned friend. It appears to have been a piece of those records which were kept in the temple of Apollo, that stood upon the promontory of Leucate. The reader will find it to be a summary account of several persons who tried the Lover's Leap, and of the success they found in it. As there seem to be in it some anachronisms and deviations from the ancient orthography, I am not wholly satisfied myself that it is authentic, and not rather the production of one of those Grecian sophisters, who have imposed upon the world several spurious works of this nature. I speak this by way of precaution, because I know there are several writers, of uncommon erudition, who would not fail to expose my ignorance, if they caught me tripping in a matter of so great moment. C

N^o 228 Wednesday, November 21.

Percunctatorem fugito, nam garrulus idem est.

Hor. Ep. 18. l. 1. v. 69.

Shun the inquisitive and curious man ;
For what he hears he will relate again. POOLY.

THERE is a creature who has all the organs of speech, a tolerable good capacity for conceiving what is said to it, together with a pretty proper behaviour in all the occurrences of common life ; but naturally very vacant of thought in its self, and therefore forced to apply itself to foreign assistances. Of this make is that man who is very inquisitive. You may often observe, that though he speaks as good sense as any man upon any thing with which he is well acquainted, he cannot trust to the range of his own fancy to entertain himself upon that foundation, but goes on still to new inquiries. Thus, though you know he is fit for the most polite conversation, you shall see him very well contented to sit by a jockey, giving an account of the many revolutions in his horse's health, what potion he made him take, how that agreed with him, how afterwards he came to his stomach and his exercise, or any the like impertinence : and be as well pleased as if you talked to him on the most important truths. This humour is far from making a man unhappy, though it may subject him to rallery; for he generally falls in with a person who seems to be born for him, which is your talkative fellow. It is so ordered, that there is a secret bent, as natural as the meeting of different Sexes, in these two characters, to supply each other's wants. I had the honour the other day to sit in a public room, and saw an inquisitive man look with an air of satisfaction upon the approach of one of these Talkers. The man of ready utterance sat down by him, and rubbing his head, leaning on his arm, and making an uneasy countenance, he began; 'There is no manner of news to-day. 'I cannot tell what is the matter with me, 'but I slept very ill last night; whether I caught 'cold or no, I know not, but I fancy I do not 'wear shoes thick enough for the weather, and 'I have coughed all this week: It must be 'so, for the custom of washing my head winter 'and summer with cold water, prevents any 'injury from the season entering that way; so it 'must come in at my feet; but I take no notice 'of it: as it comes so it goes. Most of our 'evils proceed from too much tenderness; and 'our faces are naturally as little able to resist 'the cold as other parts. The Indian answered 'very well to an European, who asked him how 'he could go naked; I am all face.'

on

I observed this discourse was as welcome to my general Inquirer as any other of more consequence could have been; but some body calling our

Talker

Talker to another part of the room, the Inquirer told the next man who sat by him, that Mr. such-a-one, who was just gone from him, used to wash his head in cold water every morning; and so repeated almost verbatim all that had been said to him. The truth is, the Inquisitive are the funnels of conversation; they do not take in any thing for their own use, but merely to pass it to another: They are the channels through which all the good and evil that is spoken in town are conveyed. Such as are offended at them, or think they suffer by their behaviour, may themselves mend that inconvenience; for they are not a malicious people, and if you will supply them, you may contradict any thing they have said before by their own mouths. A farther account of a thing is one of the gratefulest goods that can arrive to them; and it is seldom that they are more particular than to say, the town will have it, or I have it from a good hand: So that there is room for the town to know the matter more particularly, and for a better hand to contradict what was said by a good one.

I have not known this humour more ridiculous than in a father, who has been earnestly solicitous to have an account how his son has passed his leisure hours; if it be in a way thoroughly insignificant, there cannot be a greater joy than an Inquirer discovers in seeing him follow so hopefully his own steps: But this humour among men is most pleasant when they are saying something which is not wholly proper for a third person to hear, and yet is in itself indifferent.

The other day there came in a well-dressed young fellow, and two Gentlemen of this species immediately fell a whispering his pedigree. I could overhear, by breaks, She was his aunt ; then an answer, Ay, she was of the mother's side : Then again in a little lower voice, His father wore generally a darker wig ; answer, Not much. But this Gentleman wears higher heels to his shoes.

As the Inquisitive, in my opinion, are such merely from a vacancy in their own imaginations, there is nothing, methinks, so dangerous as to communicate secrets to them ; for the same temper of inquiry makes them as impertinently communicative : But no man, though he converses with them, need put himself in their power, for they will be contented with matters of less moment as well. When there is fuel enough, no matter what it is——Thus the ends of sentences in the News-papers, as, ‘ this wants confirmation, this occasions many speculations, and ‘ time will discover the event,’ are read by them, and considered not as mere expletives.

One may see now and then this humour accompanied with an insatiable desire of knowing what passes, without turning it to any use in the world but merely their own entertainment. A mind which is gratified this way is adapted to humour and pleasantry, and formed for an unconcerned character in the world ; and, like myself, to be a mere Spectator. This curiosity, without malice or self-interest, lays up in the imagination a magazine of circumstances which cannot

cannot but entertain when they are produced in conversation. If one were to know, from the man of the first Quality to the meanest servant, the different intrigues, sentiments, pleasures, and interests of mankind, would it not be the most pleasing entertainment imaginable to enjoy so constant a farce, as the observing mankind much more different from themselves in their secret thoughts and public actions, than in their night-caps and long periwigs?

Mr. SPECTATOR,

P*Lutarch* tells us, that Caius Gracchus, the Roman, was frequently hurried by his passion into so loud and tumultuous a way of speaking, and so strained his voice as not to be able to proceed. To remedy this excess, he had an ingenious servant, by name Licinius, always attending him with a pitch-pipe, or instrument to regulate the voice; who, whenever he heard his master begin to be high, immediately touched a soft note; at which, it is said, Caius would presently abate and grow calm.

Upon recollecting this story, I have frequently wondered that this useful instrument should have been so long discontinued; especially since we find that this good office of Licinius has preserved his memory for many hundred years, which, methinks, should have encouraged some one to have revived it, if not for the public good, yet for his own credit. It may be objected, that our loud talkers are so fond

' fond of their own noise, that they would not ' take it well to be checked by their servants :
 ' But granting this to be true, surely any of their ' hearers have a very good title to play a soft
 ' note in their own defence. To be short, no
 ' Licinius appearing, and the noise increasing,
 ' I was resolved to give this late long vacation to
 ' the good of my country ; and I have at length,
 ' by the assistance of an ingenious artist, (who ' works to the Royal Society) almost completed
 ' my design, and shall be ready in a short time
 ' to furnish the public with what number of ' these instruments they please, either to lodge
 ' at Coffee-houses, or carry for their own private ' use. In the mean time, I shall pay that re' spect to several Gentlemen, who I know will ' be in danger of offending against this instru' ment, to give them notice of it by private ' letters, in which I shall only write, " Get
 ' a Licinius.

' I should now trouble you no longer, but
 ' that I must not conclude without desiring you
 ' to accept one of these pipes, which shall be ' left for you with Buckley ; and which I hope
 ' will be serviceable to you, since as you are ' silent yourself you are most open to the insults
 ' of the noisy. I am, Sir, &c.

W. B.

' I had almost forgot to inform you, that as ' an improvement in this instrument, there will ' be a particular note, which I call a hush-note ;
 ' and this is to be made use of against a long
 ' story, swearing, obsceneness, and the like. T

N^o229 Thursday, November 22.

————— *Spirat adbuç amor,
Vivuntque commiffi calores Æoliæ fidibus puellæ.*

Hor. Od. 9. l. 4. v. 10.

*Sappho's charming lyre
Preserves her soft desire,
And tunes our ravish'd Souls to love.* CREECH.

AMONG the many famous pieces of antiquity which are still to be seen at Rome, there is the trunk of a Statue which has lost the arms, legs, and head; but discovers such an exquisite workmanship in what remains of it, that Michael Angelo declared he had learned his whole art from it. Indeed he studied it so attentively, that he made most of his statues, and even his pictures in that Gusto, to make use of the Italian phrase; for which reason this maimed Statue is still called Michael Angelo's School.

A Fragment of Sappho, which I design for the subject of this Paper, is in as great reputation among the Poets and Critics, as the mutilated figure above-mentioned is among the Statuaries and Painters. Several of our Countrymen, and Mr. Dryden in particular, seem very often to have copied after it in their dramatic Writings, and in their Poems upon Love.

Whatever

Whatever might have been the occasion of this Ode, the English reader will enter into the beauties of it, if he supposes it to have been written in the person of a Lover sitting by his mistress. I shall set to view three different copies of this beautiful Original: The first is a translation by Catullus, the second by Monsieur Boileau, and the last by a Gentleman whose translation of the Hymn to Venus has been so deservedly admired.

Ad L E S B I A M.

*Ille mi par esse Deo videtur, Ille, si fas est, superare divos,
 Qui sedens adversus identidem te Spectat, & audit
 Dulce ridentem, misero quod omnis Eripit sensus mihi: nam simul te,
 Lesbiam, adspexi, nihil est super mi
 Quod loquar amens.
 Lingua sed torpet: tenuis sub artus
 Flamma dimanat, sonitu suopte
 Tinniunt aures: gemina teguntur Lumina nocte.*

My learned reader will know very well the reason why one of these verses is printed in Roman letter; and if he compares this translation with the original, will find that the three first Stanzas are rendered almost word for word, and not only with the same elegance, but with the same short turn of expression which is so remarkable in the Greek, and so peculiar to the Sapphic Ode. I cannot imagine for what reason Madam Dacier has told us, that this Ode of Sappho is preserved intire in Longinus, since it is manifest to any one who looks into that Author's quotation of it, that there must at least have been another Stanza, which is not transmitted to us.

The second translation of this fragment which I shall here cite, is that of Monsieur Boileau.

Heureux ! qui prés de toi, pour toi seule soupire :
Qui jouit du plaisir de t'entendre parler :
Qui te voit quelquefois doucement lui sourire.
Les Dieux, dans son bonheur, peuvent-ils l'égalér ?

Je sens de veine en veine une subtile flamme
Courir par tout mon corps, si-tôt que je te vois :
Et dans les doux transports, où s'egare mon ame,
Je ne sçaurois trouver de langue, ni de voix.

Un nuage confus se répand sur ma vue,
Je n'entens plus, je tombe en de douces langueurs ;
Et pâle, sans haleine, interdite, éperduë,
Un frisson me saisit, je tremble, je me meurs.

The reader will see that this is rather an imitation than a translation. The circumstances do not lie so thick together, and follow one another with that vehemence and emotion as in the original. In short, Monsieur Boileau has given us all the Poetry, but not all the Passion of this famous fragment. I shall, in the last place, present my reader with the English translation.

I.

Blest as th' immortal Gods is he,
 The Youth who fondly sits by thee,
 And hears and sees thee all the while Softly speak and sweetly smile.

II.

'Twas this depriv'd my Soul of rest,
 And rais'd such tumults in my breast;
 For while I gaz'd, in transport tost,
 My breath was gone, my voice was lost:

III.

My bosom glow'd; the subtle flame
 Ran quick through all my vital frame;
 O'er my dim eyes a darkness hung;
 My ears with hollow murmurs rung.

IV.

In dewy damps my limbs were chill'd;
 My blood with gentle horrors thrill'd;
 My feeble pulse forgot to play;
 I fainted, sunk, and dy'd away.

Instead of giving any character of this last translation, I shall desire my learned reader to look into the Criticisms which Longinus has made upon the original. By that means he will know to which of the translations he ought to give the preference. I shall only add, that this translation is written in the very spirit of Sappho, and as near the Greek as the genius of our language will possibly suffer.

Longinus has observed that this description of Love in Sappho is an exact copy of nature, and that all the circumstances which follow one another in such an hurry of sentiments, notwithstanding they appear repugnant to each other, are really such as happen in the phrenzies of Love.
 and

I wonder, that not one of the Critics or Editors, through whose hands this Ode has passed, has taken occasion from it to mention a circumstance related by Plutarch. That Author in the famous story of Antiochus, who fell in love with Stratonice, his mother-in-law, and (not daring to discover his passion) pretended to be confined to his bed by sickness, tells us, that Erasistratus, the Physician, found out the nature of his distemper, by those symptoms of Love which he had learnt from Sappho's Writings. Stratonice was in the room of the love-sick Prince, when these symptoms discovered themselves to his Physician; and it is probable, that they were not very different from those which Sappho here describes in a Lover sitting by his mistress. This story of Antiochus is so well known, that I need not add the sequel of it, which has no relation to my present subject.

G

N^o 230 Friday, November 23.

Homines ad Deos nullâ re propius accedunt, quàm salutem hominibus dando. Tull.

Men resemble the Gods in nothing so much, as in doing good to their fellow-creatures.

HUMAN nature appears a very deformed, or a very beautiful object, according to the different lights in which it is viewed. When we see men of inflamed passions, or of wicked designs, tearing one another to pieces by open violence, or undermining each other by secret treachery; when we observe base and narrow ends pursued by ignominious and dishonest means; when we behold men mixed in society as if it were for the destruction of it; we are even ashamed of our Species, and out of humour with our own Being: But in another light, when we behold them mild, good, and benevolent, full of a generous regard for the public prosperity, compassionating each other's distresses, and relieving each other's wants, we can hardly believe they are creatures of the same kind. In this view they appear Gods to each other, in the exercise of the noblest power, that of doing good; and the greatest compliment we have ever been able to make to our own Being, has been by calling this disposition of mind humanity. We cannot but but observe a pleasure arising in our own breast upon the seeing or hearing of a generous action, even when we are wholly disinterested in it. I cannot give a more proper instance of this, than by a Letter from Pliny, in which he recommends a friend in the most handsom manner, and, methinks, it would be a great pleasure to know the success of this epistle, though each party concerned in it has been so many hundred years in his grave.

TO MAXIMUS.

‘ WHAT I should gladly do for any friend
 ‘ of yours, I think I may now with confidence request for a friend of mine. Arrianus Maturius is the most considerable man of his ‘ country; when I call him so, I do not speak ‘ with relation to his fortune, though that is ‘ very plentiful, but to his integrity, justice, ‘ gravity, and prudence; his advice is useful to ‘ me in business, and his judgment in matters ‘ of learning: His fidelity, truth, and good understanding, are very great; besides this, he ‘ loves me as you do, than which I cannot say ‘ any thing that signifies a warmer affection.
 ‘ He has nothing that is aspiring; and though ‘ he might rise to the highest order of Nobility, ‘ he keeps himself in an inferior rank; yet ‘ I think myself bound to use my endeavours ‘ to serve and promote him; and would therefore find the means of adding something to ‘ his honours while he neither expects nor knows

‘ it, nay, though he should refuse it. Some‘ thing, in short, I would have for him that ‘ may be honourable, but not troublesome; and ‘ I intreat that you will procure him the first ‘ thing of this kind that offers, by which you ‘ will not only oblige me, but him also; for ‘ though he does not covet it, I know he will ‘ be as grateful in acknowledging your favour as ‘ if he had asked it.’

MR. SPECTATOR,

‘ THE reflexions in some of your Papers on ‘ the servile manner of education now in ‘ use, have given birth to an ambition, which,
 ‘ unless you discountenance it, will, I doubt,
 ‘ engage me in a very difficult, though not un‘ grateful adventure. I am about to undertake, ‘ for the sake of the British youth, to instruct ‘ them in such a manner, that the most danger‘ ous page in Virgil or Homer may be read by ‘ them with much pleasure, and with perfect ‘ safety to their persons.

‘ Could I prevail so far as to be honoured ‘ with the protection of some few of them, (for ‘ I am not hero enough to rescue many) my ‘ design is to retire with them to an agreeable ‘ solitude; though within the neighbourhood of ‘ a city, for the convenience of their being in‘ structed in music, dancing, drawing, designing,
 ‘ or any other such accomplishments, which it ‘ is conceived may make as proper diversions for ‘ them, and almost as pleasant, as the little for‘ did games which dirty school-boys are so much ‘ delighted

‘ delighted with. It may easily be imagined, ‘ how such a pretty society, conversing with none ‘ beneath themselves, and sometimes admitted ‘ as perhaps not unentertaining parties amongst ‘ better company, commended and carested for ‘ their little performances, and turned by such ‘ conversations to a certain gallantry of Soul, ‘ might be brought early acquainted with some ‘ of the most polite English writers. This hav‘ ing given them some tolerable taste of books, ‘ they would make themselves masters of the ‘ Latin tongue by methods far easier than those ‘ in Lilly, with as little difficulty or reluctance ‘ as young Ladies learn to speak French, or to ‘ sing Italian Operas. When they had advanced ‘ thus far, it would be time to form their taste ‘ something more exactly: One that had any true ‘ relish of fine writing, might, with great plea‘ sure both to himself and them, run over to‘ gether with them the best Roman Historians, ‘ Poets, and Orators, and point out their more ‘ remarkable beauties; give them a short scheme
‘ of Chronology, a little view of Geography, ‘ Medals, Astronomy, or what else might best ‘ feed the busy inquisitive humour so natural to ‘ that age. Such of them as had the least spark ‘ of genius, when it was once awakened by ‘ the shining thoughts and great sentiments of ‘ those admired writers, could not, I believe, ‘ be easily withheld from attempting that more ‘ difficult sister-language, whose exalted beauties ‘ they would have heard so often celebrated ‘ as the pride and wonder of the whole learned

‘ world. In the mean while, it would be re‘ quisite to exercise their stile in writing any light ‘ pieces that ask more of fancy than of judg‘ ment : and that frequently in their native ‘ language, which every one methinks should ‘ be most concerned to cultivate, especially letters ‘ in which a Gentleman must have so frequent ‘ occasions to distinguish himself. A set of ‘ genteel good-natured youths fallen into such ‘ a manner of life, would form almost a little ‘ academy, and doubtless prove no such con‘ temptible companions, as might not often ‘ tempt a wiser man to mingle himself in their ‘ diversions, and draw them into such serious ‘ sports as might prove nothing less instructing ‘ than the gravest lessons. I doubt not but it ‘ might be made some of their favourite plays, ‘ to contend which of them should recite a ‘ beautiful part of a poem or oration most ‘ gracefully, or sometimes to join in acting a ‘ scene of Terence, Sophocles, or our own Shake- ‘ spear. The cause of Milo might again be ‘ pleaded before more favourable Judges, Cæsar ‘ a second time be taught to tremble, and an‘ other race of Athenians be afresh enraged at ‘ the ambition of another Philip. Amidst these ‘ noble amusements, we could hope to see the ‘ early dawns of their imagination daily ‘ brighten into sense, their innocence improve ‘ into virtue, and their unexperienced good-nature ‘ directed to a generous love of their country.

T

I am, &c.

Saturday,

N^o 231 Saturday, November 24.

O Pudor ! O Pietas !——

Mart.

O Modesty ! O Piety !

Looking over the Letters which I have lately received from my correspondents, I met with the following one, which is written with such a spirit of politeness, that I could not but be very much pleased with it myself, and question not but it will be as acceptable to the reader.

MR. SPECTATOR,

‘ YOU, who are no stranger to public assemblies, cannot but have observed the awe they often strike on such as are obliged to exert any talent before them. This is a sort of elegant distress, to which ingenuous minds are the most liable, and may therefore deserve some remarks in your Paper. Many a brave fellow, who has put his enemy to flight in the field, has been in the utmost disorder upon making a speech before a body of his friends at home : One would think there was some kind of fascination in the eyes of a large circle of people, when darting all together upon one person. I have seen a new Actor in a Tragedy so bound up by it as to be scarce able to speak or move,

‘ and

‘ and have expected he would have died above ‘ three Acts before the dagger or cup of poison ‘ were brought in. It would not be amiss, if ‘ such an one were at first introduced as a Ghost, ‘ or a Statue, until he recovered his spirits, and ‘ grew fit for some living part.

‘ As this sudden desertion of one’s self shews
 ‘ a diffidence, which is not displeasing, it implies ‘ at the same time the greatest respect to an ‘ audience that can be. It is a sort of mute ‘ eloquence, which pleads for their favour ‘ much better than words could do; and we ‘ find their generosity naturally moved to support ‘ those who are in so much perplexity to enter‘ tain them. I was extremely pleased with a ‘ late instance of this kind at the Opera of ‘ Almahide, in the encouragement given to a ‘ young singer, whose more than ordinary con‘ cern on her first appearance, recommended her ‘ no less than her agreeable voice, and just per‘ formance. Meer bashfulness without merit ‘ is awkward; and merit without Modesty, in‘ solent. But modest merit has a double claim ‘ to acceptance, and generally meets with as ‘ many patrons as beholders.

I am, &c.

It is impossible that a person should exert himself to advantage in an assembly, whether it be his part either to sing or speak, who lies under too great oppressions of Modesty. I remember, upon talking with a friend of mine concerning the force of pronunciation, our discourse

course led us into the enumeration of the several organs of speech which an Orator ought to have in perfection, as the tongue, the teeth, the lips, the nose, the palate, and the wind-pipe. Upon which, says my friend, you have omitted the most material organ of them all, and that is the forehead.

But notwithstanding an excess of Modesty obstructs the tongue, and renders it unfit for its offices, a due proportion of it is thought so requisite to an Orator, that Rhetoricians have recommended it to their Disciples as a particular in their art. Cicero tells us that he never liked an Orator, who did not appear in some little confusion at the beginning of his speech, and confesses that he himself never entered upon an oration without trembling and concern. It is indeed a kind of deference which is due to a great assembly, and seldom fails to raise a benevolence in the audience towards the person who speaks. My correspondent has taken notice that the bravest men often appear timorous on these occasions, as indeed we may observe, that there is generally no creature more impudent than a coward.

— Lingua melior, sed frigida bello

Dextera —

Vir. Æn. II. v. 338.

— Bold at the council-board ;

But cautious in the field, he shunn'd the sword.

DRYDEN.

A bold tongue and a feeble arm are the qualifications of Drances in Virgil; as Homer, to express a man both timorous and saucy, makes use of a kind of point, which is very rarely to be met with in his writings; namely, that he had the eyes of a dog, but the heart of a deer.

A just and reasonable Modesty does not only recommend eloquence, but sets off every great talent which a man can be possessed of. It heightens all the virtues which it accompanies; like the shades in paintings, it raises and rounds every figure, and makes the colours more beautiful, though not so glaring as they would be without it.

Modesty is not only an ornament, but also a guard to virtue. It is a kind of quick and delicate feeling in the Soul, which makes her shrink and withdraw herself from every thing that has danger in it. It is such an exquisite sensibility, as warns her to shun the first appearance of every thing which is hurtful.

I cannot at present recollect either the place or time of what I am going to mention; but I have read somewhere in the history of ancient Greece, that the women of the country were seized with an unaccountable melancholy, which disposed several of them to make away with themselves. The Senate, after having tried many expedients to prevent this self-murder, which was so frequent among them, published an Edict, That if any woman whatever should lay violent hands upon herself, her corps should be exposed naked in the street, and dragged about the

the city in the most public manner. This Edict immediately put a stop to the practice which was before so common. We may see in this instance the strength of female Modesty, which was able to overcome the violence even of madness and despair. The fear of shame in the fair Sex, was in those days more prevalent than that of death.

If Modesty has so great an influence over our actions, and is in many cases so impregnable a fence to virtue; what can more undermine morality than that politeness which reigns among the unthinking part of mankind, and treats as unfashionable the most ingenuous part of our behaviour; which recommends impudence as good-breeding, and keeps a man always in countenance, not because he is innocent, but because he is shameless?

Seneca thought Modesty so great a check to vice, that he prescribes to us the practice of it in secret, and advises us to raise it in ourselves upon imaginary occasions, when such as are real do not offer themselves; for this is the meaning of his precept, that when we are by ourselves, and in our greatest solitudes, we should fancy that Cato stands before us and sees every thing we do. In short, if you banish Modesty out of the world, she carries away with her half the virtue that is in it.

After these reflexions on Modesty, as it is a virtue; I must observe, that there is a vicious Modesty, which justly deserves to be ridiculed, and which those persons very often discover, who value

value themselves most upon a well-bred confidence. This happens when a man is ashamed to act up to his reason, and would not upon any consideration be surpris'd in the practice of those duties, for the performance of which he was sent into the world. Many an impudent libertine would blush to be caught in a serious discourse, and would scarce be able to shew his head, after having disclosed a religious thought. Decency of behaviour, all outward show of virtue, and abhorrence of vice, are carefully avoided by this set of shame-faced people, as what would disparage their gaiety of temper, and infallibly bring them to dishonour. This is such a poorness of spirit, such a despicable cowardise, such a degenerate abject state of mind, as one would think human nature incapable of, did we not meet with frequent instances of it in ordinary conversation.

There is another kind of vicious Modesty which makes a man ashamed of his person, his birth, his profession, his poverty, or the like misfortunes, which it was not in his choice to prevent, and is not in his power to rectify. If a man appears ridiculous by any of the aforementioned circumstances, he becomes much more so by being out of countenance for them. They should rather give him occasion to exert a noble spirit, and to palliate those imperfections which are not in his power, by those perfections which are; or to use a very witty allusion of an eminent Author, he should imitate Cæsar, who, because his head was bald, covered that defect with laurels.

C

Monday,

N^o 232 Monday, November 26.

Nil largiundo gloriam adeptus est.

Sallust.

By bestowing nothing he acquired Glory.

MY wife and good friend, Sir Andrew Freeport, divides himself almost equally between the town and the country: His time in town is given up to the public, and the management of his private fortune; and after every three or four days spent in this manner, he retires for as many to his seat within a few miles of the town, to the enjoyment of himself, his family, and his friend. Thus business and pleasure, or rather, in Sir Andrew, labour and rest, recommend each other: They take their turns with so quick a vicissitude, that neither becomes a habit, or takes possession of the whole man; nor is it possible he should be surfeited with either. I often see him at our Club in good humour, and yet sometimes too with an air of care in his looks: But in his country-retreat he is always unbent, and such a companion as I could desire; and therefore I seldom fail to make one with him when he is pleased to invite me.

The other day, as soon as we were got into his chariot, two or three Beggars on each side hung hung upon the doors, and solicited our charity with the usual rhetoric of a sick wife or husband at home, three or four helpless little children all starving with cold and hunger. We were forced to part with some money to get rid of their importunity; and then we proceeded on our journey with the blessings and acclamations of these people.

“ Well then, says Sir Andrew, we go off “ with the prayers and good wishes of the Beg“ gars, and perhaps too our healths will be “ drunk at the next ale-house: So all we shall “ be able to value ourselves upon, is, that we “ have promoted the trade of the victualler and “ the excises of the Government. But how few “ ounces of wooll do we see upon the backs “ of these poor creatures? And when they “ shall next fall in our way, they will hardly “ be better dressed; they must always live in “ rags to look like objects of compassion. If “ their families too are such as they are repre“ sented, it is certain they cannot be better “ clothed, and must be a great deal worse fed:
 “ One would think potatoes should be all their “ bread, and their drink the pure element;
 “ and then what goodly customers are the “ Farmers like to have for their wooll, corn and “ cattle? Such customers, and such a consump“ tion, cannot choose but advance the landed “ interest, and hold up the rents of the Gentle“ men.

“ But of all men living, we Merchants who live “ by buying and selling, ought never to encou“ rage

“ rage Beggars. The goods which we export “ are indeed the product of the lands, but “ much the greatest part of their value is the “ labour of the people: But how much of “ these peoples labour shall we export whilst “ we hire them to sit still? The very alms they “ receive from us, are the wages of idleness.
“ I have often thought that no man should be “ permitted to take relief from the parish, or “ to ask it in the street, until he has first pur“ chased as much as possible of his own liveli“ hood by the labour of his own hands; and “ then the public ought only to be taxed to “ make good the deficiency. If this rule was “ strictly observed, we should see every where “ such a multitude of new labourers, as would “ in all probability reduce the prices of all our “ manufactures. It is the very life of mer“ chandise to buy cheap and sell dear. The “ Merchant ought to make his out-set as cheap “ as possible, that he may find the greater “ profit upon his returns; and nothing will “ enable him to do this like the reduction of “ the price of labour upon all our manufac“ tures. This too would be the ready way to “ increase the number of our foreign markets:
“ The abatement of the price of the manufac“ ture would pay for the carriage of it to more “ distant countries; and this consequence would “ be equally beneficial both to the landed and “ trading interests. As so great an addition “ of labouring hands would produce this “ happy consequence both to the Merchant
VOL. III. A a “ and

“ and the Gentleman; our liberality to com“ mon Beggars, and every other obstruction to “ the increase of labourers, must be equally “ pernicious to both.”

Sir Andrew then went on to affirm, that the reduction of the prices of our manufactures by the addition of so many new hands, would be no inconvenience to any man: But observing I was something startled at the assertion, he made a short pause, and then resumed the discourse. “ It may seem, says he, a paradox, “ that the price of labour should be reduced “ without an abatement of wages, or that wages “ can be abated without any inconvenience to “ the labourer, and yet nothing is more certain “ than that both these things may happen. “ The wages of the labourers make the greatest “ part of the price of every thing that is use- “ ful; and if in proportion with the wages the “ prices of all other things shall be abated, “ every labourer with less wages would still be “ able to purchase as many necessaries of life; “ where then would be the inconvenience? “ But the price of labour may be reduced by “ the addition of more hands to a manufacture, “ and yet the wages of persons remain as “ high as ever. The admirable Sir William “ Petty has given examples of this in some of “ his writings: One of them, as I remember, “ is that of a watch, which I shall endeavour “ to explain so as shall suit my present pur- “ pose. It is certain, that a single watch could “ not be made so cheap in proportion by one only

“ only man, as a hundred watches by a hundred; for as there is vast variety in the work, no one person could equally suit himself to all the parts of it; the manufacture would be tedious, and at last but clumsily performed: But if an hundred watches were to be made by a hundred men, the cases may be assigned to one, the dials to another, the wheels to another, the springs to another, and every other part to a proper artist; as there would be no need of perplexing any one person with too much variety, every one would be able to perform his single part with greater skill and expedition; and the hundred watches would be finished in one fourth part of the time of the first one, and every one of them at one fourth part of the cost, though the wages of every man were equal. The reduction of the price of the manufacture would increase the demand of it, all the same hands would be still employed and as well paid. The same rule will hold in the clothing, the shipping, and all other trades whatsoever. And thus an addition of hands to our manufactures will only reduce the price of them; the labourer will still have as much wages, and will consequently be enabled to purchase more conveniences of life; so that every interest in the nation would receive a benefit from the increase of our working people.

“ Besides, I see no occasion for this charity to common Beggars, since every Beggar is “ an inhabitant of a parish, and every parish “ is taxed to the maintenance of their own “ poor. For my own part, I cannot be mightily “ pleased with the laws which have done “ this, which have provided better to feed than “ employ the poor. We have a Tradition from “ our forefathers, that after the first of those “ laws was made, they were insulted with “ that famous Song;

Hang sorrow, and cast away care,
 The parish is bound to find us, &c.

“ And if we will be so good-natured as to “ maintain them without work, they can “ do no less in return than sing us the merry “ Beggars.

“ What then? Am I against all acts of charity? God forbid! I know of no virtue in the Gospel that is in more pathetic expressions recommended to our practice. ‘I was hungry and ye gave me no meat, thirsty and ye gave me no drink, naked and ye clothed me not, a stranger and ye took me not in, sick and in prison and ye visited me not.’ Our blessed Saviour treats the exercise or neglect of charity towards a poor man, as the performance or breach of this duty towards himself. I shall endeavour to obey the will of my Lord and Master: And therefore if an industrious man shall submit to the hardest labour and coarsest fare, rather than endure the shame of taking relief from the parish, “ or

“ or asking it in the street, this is the hungry, “ the thirsty, the naked; and I ought to be“ lieve, if any man is come hither for shelter “ against persecution or oppression, this is the “ stranger, and I ought to take him in. If “ any countryman of our own is fallen into “ the hands of Infidels, and lives in a state “ of miserable captivity, this is the man in “ prison, and I should contribute to his ransom.
“ I ought to give to an hospital of Invalids,
“ to recover as many useful subjects as I can;
“ but I shall bestow none of my bounties upon “ an alms-house of idle people; and for the “ same reason I shall not think it a reproach “ to me if I had withheld my charity from “ those common Beggars. But we prescribe “ better rules than we are able to prac“ tise; we are ashamed not to give into the “ mistaken customs of our country: But at “ the same time, I cannot but think it a re“ proach worse than that of common swearing, “ that the idle and the abandoned are suffered “ in the name of Heaven and all that is “ sacred, to extort from christian and tender “ minds a supply to a profligate way of life, “ that is always to be supported, but never “ relieved. Z

N^o 233 Tuesday, November 27.

—Tanquam hæc sint nostri medicina furoris, Aut Deus ille malis hominum mitescere discat.

Virg. Ecl. 10. v. 60.

As if by these my sufferings I could ease,
Or by my pains the God of love appease.

DRYDEN.

I Shall, in this Paper, discharge myself of the promise I have made to the public, by obliging them with a translation of the little Greek manuscript, which is said to have been a piece of those records that were preserved in the Temple of Apollo, upon the promontory of Leucate: It is a short history of the Lover's Leap, and is inscribed, 'An account of persons, male and female, who offered up their vows in the Temple of the Pythian Apollo, in the forty-sixth Olympiad, and leaped from the promontory of Leucate into the Ionian sea, in order to cure themselves of the passion of Love.'

This account is very dry in many parts, as only mentioning the name of the Lover who leaped, the person he leaped for, and relating, in short, that he was either cured or killed, or maimed by the fall. It indeed gives the names of so many who died by it, that it would have looked like a Bill of mortality, had I translated it at full length; length; I have therefore made an abridgment of it, and only extracted such particular passages as have something extraordinary, either in the case, or in the cure, or in the fate of the person who is mentioned in it. After this short preface take the account as follows.

Battus, the son of Menalcas the Sicilian, leaped for Bombyca the Musician: Got rid of his passion with the loss of his right leg and arm, which were broken in the fall.

Melissa, in love with Daphnis, very much bruised, but escaped with life.

Cinisca, the wife of Æschines, being in love with Lycus; and Æschines her husband being in love with Eurilla; (which had made this married couple very uneasy to one another for several years) both the husband and the wife took the leap by consent; they both of them escaped, and have lived very happily together ever since.

Larissa, a virgin of Thessaly, deserted by Plexippus, after a courtship of three years; she stood upon the brow of the promontory for some time, and after having thrown down a ring, a bracelet, and a little picture, with other presents which she had received from Plexippus, she threw herself into the sea, and was taken up alive.

N. B. Larissa, before she leaped, made an offering of a silver Cupid in the Temple of Apollo.

Simætha, in love with Daphnis the Myndian, perished in the fall.

Charixus, the brother of Sappho, in love with Rhodope the courtesan, having spent his whole estate upon her, was advised by his sister to leap in the beginning of his amour, but would not hearken to her until he was reduced to his last talent; being forsaken by Rhodope, at length resolved to take the leap. Perished in it.

Aridæus, a beautiful youth of Epirus, in love with Praxinoë, the wife of Theſpis, escaped without damage, saving only that two of his foreteeth were struck out and his nose a little flatted.

Cleora, a widow of Ephesus, being inconsolable for the death of her husband, was resolved to take this leap in order to get rid of her passion for his memory; but being arrived at the promontory, she there met with Dimmachus the Miletian, and after a short conversation with him, laid aside the thoughts of her leap, and married him in the Temple of Apollo.

N. B. Her widow's weeds are still seen hanging up in the western corner of the Temple.

Olphis, the fisherman, having received a box on the ear from Thestylis the day before, and being determined to have no more to do with her, leaped, and escaped with life.

Atalanta, an old maid, whose cruelty had several years before driven two or three despairing Lovers to this leap; being now in the fifty-fifth year of her age, and in love with an Officer of Sparta, broke her neck in the fall.

Hipparchus being passionately fond of his own wife, who was enamoured of Bathyllus, leaped, and and died of his fall; upon which his wife married her gallant.

Tettyx, the Dancing-master, in love with Olympia an Athenian matron, threw himself from the rock with great agility, but was crippled in the fall.

Diagoras, the Usurer, in love with his cook-maid; he peeped several times over the precipice, but his heart misgiving him, he went back, and married her that evening.

Cinædus, after having entered his own name in the Pythian records, being asked the name of the person whom he leaped for, and being ashamed to discover it, he was set aside, and not suffered to leap.

Eunica, a maid of Paphos, aged nineteen, in love with Eurybates. Hurt in the fall, but recovered.

N. B. This was the second time of her leaping.

Hesperus, a young man of Tarentum, in love with his master's daughter. Drowned, the boats not coming in soon enough to his relief.

Sappho, the Lesbian, in love with Phaon, arrived at the Temple of Apollo, habited like a bride in garments as white as snow. She wore a garland of myrtle on her head, and carried in her hand the little musical instrument of her own invention. After having sung an hymn to Apollo, she hung up her garland on one side of his altar, and her harp on the other. She then tucked up her vestments, like a Spartan virgin, and amidst thousands of spectators, who were anxious xious for her safety, and offered up vows for her deliverance, marched directly forwards to the utmost summit of the promontory, where after having repeated a stanza of her own verses, which we could not hear, she threw herself off the rock with such an intrepidity as was never before observed in any who had attempted that dangerous leap. Many who were present related, that they saw her fall into the sea, from whence she never rose again; though there were others who affirmed, that she never came to the bottom of her leap, but that she was changed into a swan as she fell, and that they saw her hovering in the air under that shape. But whether or no the whiteness and fluttering of her garments might not deceive those who looked upon her, or whether she might not really be metamorphosed into that musical and melancholy bird, is still a doubt among the Lesbians.

Alcæus, the famous Lyric Poet, who had for some time been passionately in love with Sappho, arrived at the promontory of Leucate that very evening, in order to take the leap upon her account; but hearing that Sappho had been there before him, and that her body could be no where found, he very generously lamented her fall, and is said to have written his hundred and twenty fifth Ode upon that occasion.

Leaped in this Olympiad 250.

Males 124

Females 126

Cured 120

Males 51

Females 69

C

N^o 234 Wednesday, November 28.

Vellem in amicitia sic erraremus.

Hor. Sat. 3. l. i. v. 41.

I wish this error in our friendship reign'd.

CREECH.

YOU very often hear people, after a story has been told with some entertaining circumstances, tell it over again with particulars that destroy the jest, but give light into the truth of the narration. This sort of veracity, though it is impertinent, has something amiable in it, because it proceeds from the love of truth, even in frivolous occasions. If such honest amendments do not promise an agreeable companion, they do a sincere friend; for which reason one should allow them so much of our time, if we fall into their company, as to set us right in matters that can do us no manner of harm, whether the facts be one way or the other.

Lies

Lies which are told out of arrogance and ostentation a man should detect in his own defence, because he should not be triumphed over; Lies which are told out of malice he should expose, both for his own sake and that of the rest of mankind, because every man should rise against a common enemy: But the officious Liar many have argued is to be excused, because it does some man good, and no man hurt. The man who made more than ordinary speed from a fight in which the Athenians were beaten, and told them they had obtained a complete victory, and put the whole city into the utmost joy and exultation, was checked by the magistrates for his falshood; but excused himself by saying, ‘O Athenians! am I your enemy because I gave you two happy days?’ This fellow did to a whole people what an acquaintance of mine does every day he lives in some eminent degree to particular persons. He is ever lying people into good humour, and, as Plato said, it was allowable in Physicians to lie to their patients to keep up their spirits, I am half doubtful whether my friend’s behaviour is not as excusable. His manner is to express himself surpris’d at the chearful countenance of a man whom he observes diffident of himself; and generally by that means makes his lye a truth. He will, as if he did not know any thing of the circumstance, ask one whom he knows at variance with another, what is the meaning that Mr. such-a-one, naming his adversary, does not applaud him with that heartiness which formerly he he has heard him? He said indeed, (continues he) I would rather have that man for my friend than any man in England; but for an enemy — This melts the person he talks to, who expected nothing but downright rallery from that side. According as he sees his practices succeed, he goes to the opposite party, and tells him, he cannot imagine how it happens that some people know one another so little; you spoke with so much coldness of a Gentleman who said more good of you, than, let me tell you, any man living deserves. The success of one of these incidents was, that the next time that one of the adversaries spied the other, he hems after him in the public street, and they must crack a bottle at the next Tavern, that used to turn out of the other's way to avoid one another's eye-shot. He will tell one Beauty she was commended by another, nay, he will say she gave the woman he speaks to, the preference in a particular for which she herself is admired. The pleasantest confusion imaginable is made through the whole town by my friend's indirect offices; you shall have a visit returned after half a year's absence, and mutual railing at each other every day of that time. They meet with a thousand lamentations for so long a separation, each party naming herself for the greatest delinquent, if the other can possibly be so good as to forgive her, which she has no reason in the world, but from the knowledge of her goodness, to hope for. Very often a whole train of railers of each side tire their horses in setting matters right which they have said during the war between the parties; and a whole circle of acquaintance are put into a thousand pleasing passions and sentiments, instead of the pangs of anger, envy, detraction, and malice.

in

The worst evil I ever observed this man's falsehood occasion, has been that he turned detraction into flattery. He is well skilled in the manners of the world, and by overlooking what men really are, he grounds his artifices upon what they have a mind to be. Upon this foundation, if two distant friends are brought together, and the cement seems to be weak, he never rests until he finds new appearances to take off all remains of ill-will, and that by new misunderstandings they are thoroughly reconciled.

TO THE SPECTATOR.

S I R,

Devonshire, Nov. 14, 1711.

THERE arrived in this neighbourhood two days ago one of your gay Gentlemen of the town, who being attended at his entry with a servant of his own, besides a countryman he had taken up for a guide, excited the curiosity of the village to learn whence and what he might be. The countryman (to whom they applied as most easy of access) knew little more than that the Gentleman came from London to travel and see fashions, and was, as he heard say, a Free-thinker: What religion that might be, he could not tell; and for his own part, if they had not told

‘ told him the man was a Free-thinker, he should ‘ have guessed, by his way of talking, he was ‘ little better than a Heathen; excepting only ‘ that he had been a good Gentleman to him,
‘ and made him drunk twice in one day, over ‘ and above what they had bargained for.

‘ I do not look upon the simplicity of this,
‘ and several odd inquiries with which I shall ‘ not trouble you, to be wondered at, much less ‘ can I think that our youths of fine wit, and ‘ enlarged understandings, have any reason to ‘ laugh. There is no necessity that every ‘Squire ‘ in Great Britain should know what the word ‘ Free-thinker stands for; but it were much to ‘ be wished, that they who value themselves ‘ upon that conceited Title were a little better ‘ instructed in what it ought to stand for; and ‘ that they would not persuade themselves a man ‘ is really and truly a Free-thinker in any tolerable ‘ sense, merely by virtue of his being an Atheist, ‘ or an Infidel of any other distinction. It may ‘ be doubted with good reason, whether there ‘ ever was in nature a more abject, slavish, and ‘ bigotted generation than the tribe of Beaux
‘ Esprits, at present so prevailing in this island.
‘ Their pretension to be Free-thinkers, is no ‘ other than Rakes have to be Free-livers, and ‘ Savages to be Free-men, that is, they can ‘ think whatever they have a mind to, and give ‘ themselves up to whatever conceit the extrava-‘ gancy of their inclination, or their fancy, shall ‘ suggest; they can think as wildly as they talk ‘ and act, and will not endure that their wit ‘ should

‘ should be controuled by such formal things as ‘ decency and common sense : Deduction, co‘ herence, consistency, and all the rules of reason ‘ they accordingly disdain, as too precise and ‘ mechanical for men of a liberal education.

‘ This, as far as I could ever learn from their ‘ writings, or my own observation, is a true ‘ account of the British Free-thinker. Our ‘ visitant here, who gave occasion to this Paper, ‘ has brought with him a new system of com‘ mon sense, the particulars of which I am not ‘ yet acquainted with, but will lose no oppor‘ tunity of informing myself whether it contain ‘ any thing worth Mr. SPECTATOR’s notice.
 ‘ In the mean time, Sir, I cannot but think it ‘ would be for the good of mankind, if you ‘ would take this subject into your own con‘ sideration, and convince the hopeful youth of ‘ our nation, that Licentiousness is not Freedom ;
 ‘ or, if such a paradox will not be understood, ‘ that a prejudice towards Atheism is not Impar‘ tiality.

I am, Sir,

Your most humble servant,

T

PHILONOUS.

Thursday,

N^o 235 Thursday, November 29.

— Populares

Vincentem strepitus — Hor. Ars. Poet. v. 81.

Awes the tumultuous noises of the pit.

ROSCOMMON.

THERE is nothing which lies more within the province of a Spectator than public shows and diversions; and as among these there are none which can pretend to vie with those elegant entertainments that are exhibited in our Theatres, I think it particularly incumbent on me to take notice of every thing that is remarkable in such numerous and refined assemblies.

It is observed, that of late years there has been a certain person in the upper gallery of the Play-house, who when he is pleased with any thing that is acted upon the stage, expresses his approbation by a loud knock upon the benches or the wainscot, which may be heard over the whole Theatre. This person is commonly known by the name of the 'Trunk-maker' in the upper gallery.' Whether it be, that the blow he gives on these occasions resembles that which is often heard in the shops of such Artisans, or that he was supposed to have been a real Trunk-maker, who after the finishing of his day's work used to unbend at these public diversions with his hammer in his hand, I cannot certainly tell. There are some, I know, who have been foolish enough to imagine it is a Spirit which haunts the upper gallery, and from time to time makes those strange noises; and the rather because he is observed to be louder than ordinary every time the Ghost of Hamlet appears. Others have reported, that it is a dumb man, who has chosen this way of uttering himself when he is transported with any thing he sees or hears. Others will have it to be the Play-house thunderer, that exerts himself after this manner in the upper gallery, when he has nothing to do upon the roof.

But having made it my business to get the best information I could in a matter of this moment, I find that the Trunk-maker, as he is commonly called, is a large black man, whom no-body knows. He generally leans forward on a huge oaken plant with great attention to every thing that passes upon the stage. He is never seen to smile; but upon hearing any thing that pleases him, he takes up his staff with both hands, and lays it upon the next piece of timber that stands in his way with exceeding vehemence: After which, he composes himself in his former posture, until such time as something new sets him again at work.

It has been observed, his blow is so well timed, that the most judicious Critic could never except against it. As soon as any shining thought is expressed in the Poet, or any uncommon grace appears in the Actor, he smites the bench or wainscot. If the Audience does not concur with him, he smites a second time, and if the Audience is not yet awaked, looks round him with great wrath, and repeats the blow a third time, which never fails to produce the clap. He sometimes lets the audience begin the clap of themselves, and at the conclusion of their applause ratifies it with a single thwack.

He is of so great use to the Play-house, that it is said a former Director of it, upon his not being able to pay his attendance by reason of sickness, kept one in pay to officiate for him until such time as he recovered; but the person so employed, though he laid about him with incredible violence, did it in such wrong places, that the Audience soon found out that it was not their old friend the Trunk-maker.

It has been remarked, that he has not yet exerted himself with vigour this season. He sometimes plies at the Opera; and upon Niccolini's first appearance, was said to have demolished three benches in the fury of his applause. He has broken half a dozen oaken plants upon Dogget, and seldom goes away from a Tragedy of Shakespeare, without leaving the wainscot extremely shattered.

The Players do not only connive at his obstreperous approbation, but very chearfully repair at their own cost whatever damages he makes. They had once a thought of erecting a kind of wooden anvil for his use, that should be made of a very sounding plank, in order to render his strokes more deep and mellow; but as this might not have been distinguished from the music of a Kettle-drum, the project was laid aside.

In the mean while, I cannot but take notice of the great use it is to an Audience, that a person should thus preside over their heads like the Director of a Consort, in order to awaken their attention, and beat time to their applauses; or, to raise my simile, I have sometimes fancied the Trunk-maker in the upper gallery to be like Virgil's ruler of the winds, seated upon the top of a mountain, who when he struck his sceptre upon the side of it, roused an hurricane, and set the whole cavern in an uproar.

It is certain, the Trunk-maker has saved many a good Play, and brought many a graceful Actor into reputation, who would not otherwise have been taken notice of. It is very visible, as the Audience is not a little abashed, if they find themselves betrayed into a clap, when their friend in the upper gallery does not come into it; so the Actors do not value themselves upon the clap, but regard it as a mere Brutum fulmen, or empty noise, when it has not the sound of the oaken plant in it. I know it has been given out by those who are enemies to the Trunk-maker, maker, that he has sometimes been bribed to be in the interest of a bad Poet, or a vicious Player; but this is a surmise which has no foundation; his strokes are always just, and his admonitions seasonable; he does not deal about his blows at random, but always hits the right nail upon the head. The inexpressible force wherewith he lays them on, sufficiently shews the evidence and strength of his conviction. His zeal for a good Author is indeed outrageous, and breaks down every fence and partition, every board and plank, that stands within the expression of his applause.

As I do not care for terminating my thoughts in barren Speculations, or in reports of pure matter of fact, without drawing something from them for the advantage of my countrymen, I shall take the liberty to make an humble proposal, that whenever the Trunk-maker shall depart this life, or whenever he shall have lost the spring of his arm by sickness, old age, infirmity, or the like, some able-bodied Critic should be advanced to this post, and have a competent salary settled on him for life, to be furnished with bamboos for Operas, crabtree-cudgels for Comedies, and oaken plants for Tragedy, at the public expence. And to the end that this place should be always disposed of according to merit, I would have none preferred to it, who has not given convincing proofs both of a sound judgment and a strong arm, and who could not, upon occasion, either knock down an Ox, or write a comment upon Horace's Art of Poetry. In short, I would have him a due composition of Hercules and Apollo, and so rightly qualified for this important office that the Trunk-maker may not be missed by our posterity.

C

N^o 236 Friday, November 30.

—Dare jura maritis. Hor. Ars Poet. v. 398.

With laws connubial tyrants to restrain.

MR. SPECTATOR,

YOU have not spoken in so direct a manner upon the subject of Marriage as that important case deserves. It would not be improper to observe upon the peculiarity in the youth of Great Britain, of railing and laughing at that institution; and when they fall into it, from a profligate habit of mind, being insensible of the satisfaction in that way of life, and treating their wives with the most barbarous disrespect.

Particular circumstances and cast of temper, must teach a man the probability of mighty uneasinesses in that state, (for unquestionably some there are whose very dispositions are strangely averse to conjugal friendship;) but no one, I believe, is by his own natural complexion prompted to tease and torment another other

‘ other for no reason but being nearly allied to him : And can there be any thing more base, or serve to sink a man so much below his own distinguishing characteristic, (I mean reason) than returning evil for good in so open a manner, as that of treating an helpless creature with unkindness, who has had so good an opinion of him as to believe what he said relating to one of the greatest concerns of life, by delivering her happiness in this world to his care and protection ? Must not that man be abandoned even to all manner of humanity, who can deceive a woman with appearances of affection and kindness, for no other end but to torment her with more ease and authority ? Is any thing more unlike a Gentleman, than when his honour is engaged for the performing his promises, because nothing but that can oblige him to it, to become afterwards false to his word, and be alone the occasion of misery to one whose happiness he but lately pretended was dearer to him than his own ? Ought such a one to be trusted in his common affairs ? or treated but as one whose honesty consisted only in his incapacity of being otherwise ?

‘ There is one cause of this usage no less absurd than common, which takes place among the more unthinking men ; and that is the desire to appear to their friends free and at liberty, and without those trammels they have so much ridiculed. To avoid this they fly into the other extreme, and grow tyrants that they ‘ may seem masters. Because an uncontrollable ‘ command of their own actions is a certain sign ‘ of intire dominion, they will not so much as ‘ recede from the government even in one muscle ‘ of their faces. A kind look they believe would ‘ be fawning, and a civil answer yielding the ‘ superiority. To this must we attribute an ‘ austerity they betray in every action: What ‘ but this can put a man out of humour in ‘ his wife’s company, though he is so distin‘ guishingly pleasant every where else? The ‘ bitterness of his replies, and the severity of ‘ his frowns to the tenderest of wives, clearly ‘ demonstrate, that an ill-grounded fear of being ‘ thought too submissive, is at the bottom of ‘ this, as I am willing to call it, affected ‘ moroseness; but if it be such only, put on to ‘ convince his acquaintance of his intire do‘ minion, let him take care of the consequence, ‘ which will be certain, and worse than the ‘ present evil; his seeming indifference will by ‘ degrees grow into real contempt, and, if it ‘ doth not wholly alienate the affections of his ‘ wife for ever from him, make both him and ‘ her more miserable than if it really did so.

‘ However inconsistent it may appear, to be ‘ thought a well-bred person has no small share ‘ in this clownish behaviour: A discourse there‘ fore relating to good-breeding towards a loving ‘ and a tender wife, would be of great use to ‘ this sort of Gentlemen. Could you but once ‘ convince them, that to be civil at least is not ‘ beneath the character of a Gentleman, nor ‘ even ‘ even tender affection towards one who would ‘ make it reciprocal, betrays any softness or ef-‘ feminacy that the most masculine disposition ‘ need be ashamed of; could you satisfy them ‘ of the generosity of voluntary civility, and ‘ the greatness of Soul that is conspicuous in ‘ benevolence without immediate obligations; ‘ could you recommend to people’s practice the ‘ saying of the Gentleman quoted in one of your ‘ Speculations, “ That he thought it incumbent “ upon him to make the Inclinations of a woman “ of merit go along with her Duty:” Could ‘ you, I say, persuade these men of the beauty ‘ and reasonableness of this sort of behaviour, ‘ I have so much charity for some of them at ‘ least, to believe you would convince them of ‘ a thing they are only ashamed to allow: Be‘ sides, you would recommend that state in its ‘ truest, and consequently its most agreeable ‘ colours; and the Gentlemen who have for ‘ any time been such professed enemies to it, ‘ when occasion should serve, would return you ‘ their thanks for assisting their interest in pre‘ vailing over their prejudices. Marriage in ‘ general would by this means be a more easy ‘ and comfortable condition; the husband would ‘ be no where so well satisfied as in his own ‘ parlour, nor the wife so pleasant as in the ‘ company of her husband: A desire of being ‘ agreeable in the Lover would be increased in ‘ the Husband, and the Mistress be more amiable ‘ by becoming the Wife. Besides all which, ‘ I am apt to believe we should find the race of ‘ men

‘ men grow wiser as their progenitors grew ‘ kinder, and the affection of their parents would ‘ be conspicuous in the wisdom of their children;
 ‘ in short, men would in general be much better ‘ humoured than they are, did not they so fre‘ quently exercise the worst turns of their tem‘ per where they ought to exert the best.’

Mr. SPECTATOR,

‘ I Am a woman who left the admiration of ‘ this whole town, to throw myself (for love ‘ of wealth) into the arms of a fool. When ‘ I married him, I could have had any one of ‘ several men of sense who languished for me;
 ‘ but my case is just. I believed my superior un‘ derstanding would form him into a tractable ‘ creature. But, alas, my spouse has cunning ‘ and suspicion, the inseparable companions of ‘ little minds; and every attempt I make to ‘ divert, by putting on an agreeable air, a sudden ‘ cheerfulness, or kind behaviour, he looks upon ‘ as the first acts towards an insurrection against ‘ his undeserved dominion over me. Let every ‘ one who is still to choose, and hopes to govern
 ‘ a fool, remember

● TRISTISSA.

Mr.

Saint Martins, Novemb. 25.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

THIS is to complain of an evil practice which I think very well deserves a redress, though you have not as yet taken any notice of it: If you mention it in your Paper, it may perhaps have a very good effect. What I mean is the disturbance some people give to others at church, by their repetition of the prayers after the Minister, and that not only in the prayers, but also the absolution and the commandments fare no better, which are in a particular manner the Priest's office: This I have known done in so audible a manner, that sometimes their voices have been as loud as his. As little as you would think it, this is frequently done by people seemingly devout. This irreligious inadvertency is a thing extremely offensive: But I do not recommend it as a thing I give you liberty to ridicule, but hope it may be amended by the bare mention.

Sir,

Your very humble servant,

T

T. S.

Saturday.

N^o 237 Saturday, December 1.

Visu carentem magna pars veri latet.

Seneca in Œdip.

Truth is in a great measure concealed from the blind.

IT is very reasonable to believe, that part of the pleasure which happy minds shall enjoy in a future State, will arise from an enlarged contemplation of the divine Wisdom in the government of the world, and a discovery of the secret and amazing steps of Providence, from the beginning to the end of time. Nothing seems to be an entertainment more adapted to the nature of man, if we consider that Curiosity is one of the strongest and most lasting appetites implanted in us, and that Admiration is one of our most pleasing passions; and what a perpetual succession of enjoyments will be afforded to both these, in a scene so large and various as shall then be laid open to our view in the society of superior Spirits, who perhaps will join with us in so delightful a prospect!

It is not impossible, on the contrary, that part of the punishment of such as are excluded from bliss, may consist not only in their being denied this privilege, but in having their appetites at the same time vastly increased, without any satisfaction afforded to them. In these, the vain pursuit of knowledge shall, perhaps, add to their infelicity, and bewilder them into labyrinths of error, darkness, distraction and uncertainty of every thing but their own evil state. Milton has thus represented the fallen Angels reasoning together in a kind of respite from their torments, and creating to themselves a new disquiet amidst their very amusements; he could not properly have described the sports of condemned Spirits, without that cast of horror and melancholy he has so judiciously mingled with them.

Others apart sat on a hill retir'd,
In thoughts more elevate, and reason'd high
Of providence, foreknowledge, will, and fate,
Fixt fate, freewill, foreknowledge absolute,
And found no end in wandering mazes lost.

In our present condition, which is a middle state, our minds are, as it were, chequered with truth and falsehood; and as our faculties are narrow, and our views imperfect, it is impossible but our Curiosity must meet with many repulses. The business of mankind in this life being rather to act than to know, their portion of knowledge is dealt to them accordingly.

From hence it is, that the reason of the inquisitive has so long been exercised with difficulties, in accounting for the promiscuous distribution of good and evil to the virtuous and the wicked in this world. From hence come all those pathetic complaints of so many tragical events, which happen to the wise and the good; and of such surprising prosperity, which is often the reward of the guilty and the foolish; that reason is sometimes puzzled, and at a loss what to pronounce upon so mysterious a dispensation.
and

Plato expresses his abhorrence of some fables of the Poets, which seem to reflect on the Gods as the authors of injustice; and lays it down as a principle, that whatever is permitted to befall a just man, whether poverty, sickness, or any of those things which seem to be evils, shall either in life or death conduce to his good. My reader will observe how agreeable this maxim is to what we find delivered by a greater authority. Seneca has written a discourse purposely on this subject, in which he takes pains, after the doctrine of the Stoics, to shew that adversity is not in itself an evil; and mentions a noble saying of Demetrius, 'That nothing would be more unhappy than a man who had never known affliction.' He compares prosperity to the indulgence of a fond mother to a child, which often proves his ruin; but the affection of the divine Being to that of a wise father who would have his sons exercised with labour, disappointment, and pain, that they may gather strength and improve their fortitude. On this occasion the Philosopher rises into that celebrated sentiment, 'That there is not on earth a spectacle more worthy the regard of a Creator intent on his works than a brave man superior to his sufferings;' to which he adds, 'that it must be a pleasure to Jupiter himself to look down from heaven,

‘ heaven, and see Cato amidst the ruins of his ‘ country preserving his integrity.’

This thought will appear yet more reasonable, if we consider human life as a state of probation, and adversity as the post of honour in it, assigned often to the best and most select Spirits.

But what I would chiefly insist on here, is, that we are not at present in a proper situation to judge of the counsels by which Providence acts, since but little arrives at our knowledge, and even that little we discern imperfectly; or according to the elegant figure in holy Writ, ‘ We see but in part, and as in a glass darkly.’ It is to be considered, that Providence in its oeconomy regards the whole system of time, and things together, so that we cannot discover the beautiful connexion between incidents which lie widely separate in time, and by losing so many links of the chain, our reasonings become broken and imperfect. Thus those parts of the moral world which have not an absolute, may yet have a relative beauty, in respect of some other parts concealed from us, but open to His eye before whom past, present, and to come, are set together in one point of view: and those events, the permission of which seems now to accuse his goodness, may in the consummation of things both magnify his goodness, and exalt his wisdom. And this is enough to check our presumption, since it is in vain to apply our measures of regularity to matters of which we know neither the antecedents nor the consequents, the beginning nor the end.

I shall relieve my readers from this abstracted thought, by relating here a Jewish tradition concerning Moses, which seems to be a kind of parable, illustrating what I have last mentioned. That great Prophet, it is said, was called up by a voice from heaven to the top of a mountain; where, in a conference with the Supreme Being, he was permitted to propose to him some questions concerning his administration of the Universe: In the midst of this divine colloquy he was commanded to look down on the plain below. At the foot of the mountain there issued out a clear spring of water, at which a soldier alighted from his horse to drink. He was no sooner gone than a little boy came to the same place, and finding a purse of gold which the soldier had dropped, took it up and went away with it. Immediately after this came an infirm old man, weary with age and travelling, and having quenched his thirst, sat down to rest himself by the side of the spring. The soldier missing his purse returns to search for it, and demands it of the old man, who affirms he had not seen it, and appeals to heaven in witness of his innocence. The soldier not believing his protestations, kills him. Moses fell on his face with horror and amazement, when the divine Voice thus prevented his expostulation; ‘Be not surprised, Moses, nor ask why the Judge of the whole earth has suffered this thing to come to pass: The child is the occasion that the blood of the old man is spilt; but know, that the old man whom thou sawest, was the murderer of that child’s father.’ C

Monday,

N^o 238 Monday, December 3.

Nequicquam populo bibulas donaveris aures;
Respue quod non es ——— Perf. Sat. 4. v. 50.

Please not thyself the flatt'ring crowd to hear;
 'Tis fulsom stuff, to please thy itching ear.
 Survey thy Soul, not what thou dost appear,
 But what thou art. ——— DRYDEN.

AMONG all the diseases of the mind, there is not one more epidemical or more pernicious than the love of Flattery. For as where the juices of the body are prepared to receive a malignant influence, there the disease rages with most violence; so in this distemper of the mind, where there is ever a propensity and inclination to suck in the poison, it cannot be but that the whole order of reasonable action must be overturned, for, like music, it ———— So softens and disarms the mind,

 That not one arrow can resistance find.

First we flatter ourselves, and then the Flattery of others is sure of success. It awakens our Self-love within, a party which is ever ready to revolt from our better judgment, and join the enemy without. Hence it is, that the profusion of favours we so often see poured upon the Parasite, are represented to us, by our Self-love, as justice done to the man, who so agreeably reconciles us to ourselves. When we are overcome by such soft insinuations and enslaving compliances, we gladly recompense the artifices that are made use of to blind our reason, and which triumph over the weaknesses of our temper and inclinations.

But were every man persuaded from how mean and low a principle this passion is derived, there can be no doubt but the person who should attempt to gratify it, would then be as contemptible as he is now successful. It is the desire of some quality we are not possessed of, or inclination to be something we are not, which are the causes of our giving ourselves up to that man, who bestows upon us the characters and qualities of others; which perhaps suit us as ill and were as little designed for our wearing, as their clothes. Instead of going out of our own complexional nature into that of others, it were a better and more laudable industry to improve our own, and instead of a miserable copy become a good original; for there is no temper, no disposition so rude and untractable, but may in its own peculiar cast and turn be brought to some agreeable use in conversation, or in the affairs of life. A person of a rougher deportment, and less tied up to the usual ceremonies of behaviour, will, like Manly in the Play, please by the grace which nature gives to every action wherein she is complied with; the brisk and lively will not want their admirers, admirers, and even a more reserved and melancholy temper may at some times be agreeable.

When there is not vanity enough awake in a man to undo him, the Flatterer stirs up that dormant weakness, and inspires him with merit enough to be a Coxcomb. But if Flattery be the most sordid act that can be complied with, the art of Praising justly is as commendable: For it is laudable to praise well; as Poets at one and the same time give Immortality and receive it themselves for a reward: Both are pleased, the one whilst he receives the recompence of merit, the other whilst he shews he knows how to discern it; but above all, that man is happy in this art, who, like a skilful Painter, retains the features and complexion, but still softens the picture into the most agreeable likeness.

There can hardly, I believe, be imagined a more desirable pleasure, than that of Praise unmixed with any possibility of Flattery. Such was that which Germanicus enjoyed, when, the night before a battle, desirous of some sincere mark of the esteem of his Legions for him, he is described by Tacitus listening in a disguise to the discourse of a Soldier, and wrapt up in the fruition of his glory, whilst with an undesigned sincerity they praised his noble and majestic mien, his affability, his valour, conduct, and success in war. How must a man have his heart full-blown with joy in such an article of glory as this? What a spur and encouragement still to proceed in those steps which had already brought him to so pure a taste of the greatest of mortal enjoyments?

It sometimes happens, that even enemies and envious persons bestow the sincerest marks of esteem when they least design it. Such afford a greater pleasure, as extorted by merit, and freed from all suspicion of favour or flattery. Thus it is with Malvolio; he has wit, learning, and discernment, but tempered with an allay of envy, Self-love, and detraction: Malvolio turns pale at the mirth and good-humour of the company, if it center not in his person; he grows jealous and displeased when he ceases to be the only person admired, and looks upon the commendations paid to another as a detraction from his merit, and an attempt to lessen the superiority he affects; but by this very method, he bestows such Praise as can never be suspected of Flattery. His uneasiness and distastes are so many sure and certain signs of another's title to that glory he desires, and has the mortification to find himself not possessed of.

A good name is fitly compared to a precious ointment, and when we are praised with skill and decency, it is indeed the most agreeable perfume, but if too strongly admitted into a brain of a less vigorous and happy texture, it will, like too strong an odour, overcome the senses, and prove pernicious to those nerves it was intended to refresh. A generous mind is of all others the most sensible of Praise and Dispraise; and a noble spirit is as much invigorated with its due proportion of honour and applause, applause, as it is depressed by neglect and contempt: But it is only persons far above the common level who are thus affected with either of these extremes; as in a Thermometer, it is only the purest and most sublimated spirit that is either contracted or dilated by the benignity or inclemency of the season.

MR. SPECTATOR,

THE translations which you have lately given us from the Greek, in some of your last Papers, have been the occasion of my looking into some of those authors; among whom I chanced on a collection of Letters which pass under the name of Aristænetus. Of all the remains of antiquity, I believe there can be nothing produced of an air so gallant and polite; each Letter contains a little novel or adventure, which is told with all the beauties of language, and heightened with a luxuriance of wit. There are several of them translated, but with such wide deviations from the original, and in a stile so far differing from the author's, that the translator seems rather to have taken hints for the expressing his own sense and thoughts, than to have endeavoured to render those of Aristænetus. In the following translation, I have kept as near the meaning of the Greek as I could, and have only added a few words to make the sentences in English fit together a little better than they would otherwise have done. The story seems to be taken from that of Pig-

' malion and the Statue in Ovid: Some of ' the thoughts are of the same turn, and the ' whole is written in a kind of poetical prose.

PHILOPINAX to CHROMATION.

" N E V E R was man more overcome
" with so fantastical a passion as mine. I " have painted a beautiful woman, and am " despairing, dying for the Picture. My own
" skill has undone me; it is not the dart of " Venus, but my own pencil has thus wounded
" me. Ah me! with what anxiety am I " necessitated to adore my own Idol? How " miserable am I, whilst every one must as " much pity the Painter as he praises the Picture,
" and own my torment more than equal to " my art. But why do I thus complain?
" Have there not been more unhappy and " unnatural passions than mine? Yes, I have " seen the representations of Phædra, Nar- " cissus, and Pasiphaë. Phædra was unhappy in " her love; that of Pasiphaë was monstrous; and
" whilst the other caught at his beloved like" ness, he destroyed the watery image, which " ever eluded his embraces. The fountain re" presented Narcissus to himself, and the picture
" both that and him, thirsting after his adored
" image. But I am yet less unhappy, I enjoy her " presence continually, and if I touch her, I de" stroy not the beauteous form, but she looks
" pleased, and a sweet smile sits in the charming " space which divides her lips. One would swear
" that

“ that voice and speech were issuing out, and “ that one’s ears felt the melodious sound.
“ How often have I, deceived by a Lover’s “ credulity, hearkened if she had not some“ thing to whisper me? and when frustrated of “ my hopes, how often have I taken my “ revenge in kisses from her cheeks and eyes, “ and softly wooed her to my embrace, whilst “ she (as to me it seemed) only withheld her “ tongue the more to inflame me. But, mad“ man that I am, shall I be thus taken with “ the representation only of a beauteous face, “ and flowing hair, and thus waste myself and “ melt to tears for a shadow? Ah, sure it is “ something more, it is a reality! for see her “ beauties shine out with new lustre, and she “ seems to upbraid me with such unkind “ reproaches. Oh may I have a living mistress “ of this form, that when I shall compare the “ work of Nature with that of Art, I may be “ still at a loss which to choose, and be long “ perplexed with the pleasing uncertainty. T

N^o 239 Tuesday, December 4.

—Bella, horrida bella!

Virg. Æn. 6. v. 86.

Wars, horrid wars!

DRYDEN.

I Have sometimes amused myself with considering the several methods of managing a Debate which have obtained in the world.

The first races of mankind used to dispute, as our ordinary people do now-a-days in a kind of wild Logic, uncultivated by rules of art.

Socrates introduced a catechetical method of arguing. He would ask his adversary question upon question, until he had convinced him out of his own mouth that his opinions were wrong. This way of debating drives an enemy up into a corner, seizes all the passes through which he can make an escape, and forces him to surrender at discretion.

Aristotle changed this method of attack, and invented a great variety of little weapons, called Syllogisms. As in the Socratic way of dispute you agree to every thing which your opponent advances, in the Aristotelic you are still denying and contradicting some part or other of what he says. Socrates conquers you by stratagem, Aristotle by force: The one takes the town by sap, the other sword in hand.

The Universities of Europe, for many years, carried on their debates by Syllogism, inſomuch that we ſee the knowledge of ſeveral centuries laid out into objections and answers, and all the good ſenſe of the age cut and minced into almoſt an infinitude of diſtinctions.

When our Universities found that there was no end of wrangling this way, they invented a kind of argument, which is not reducible to any mood or figure in Aristotle. It was called the Argumentum Baſilinum (others write it Bacilinum or Baculinum) which is pretty well expreſſed in our Engliſh word Club-law. When they were not able to confute their antagoniſt, they knocked him down. It was their method in theſe polemical debates, firſt to diſcharge their Syllogiſms, and afterwards to betake themſelves to their clubs, until ſuch time as they had one way or other confounded their gainſayers. There is in Oxford a narrow deſile, (to make uſe of a military term) where the partiſans uſed to encounter, for which reaſon it ſtill retains the name of Logic-lane. I have heard an old Gentleman, a Phyſician, make his boaſts, that when he was a young fellow he marched ſeveral times at the head of a troop of Scotiſts, and cudgelled a body of Smigleſians half the length of High-ſtreet, until they had diſperſed themſelves for ſhelter into their reſpective gariſons.

This humour, I find, went very far in Eraſmus's time. For that Author tells us, that upon the revival of Greek letters, moſt of the Universities in Europe were divided into Greeks and Trojans.

Trojans. The latter were those who bore a mortal enmity to the language of the Grecians, insomuch that if they met with any who understood it, they did not fail to treat him as a foe. Erasmus himself had, it seems, the misfortune to fall into the hands of a party of Trojans, who laid him on with so many blows and buffets that he never forgot their hostilities to his dying day.

There is a way of managing an argument not much unlike the former, which is made use of by states and communities, when they draw up a hundred thousand disputants on each side, and convince one another by dint of sword. A certain grand Monarch was so sensible of his strength in this way of reasoning, that he writ upon his great guns—Ratio ultima Regnum, ‘The Logic of Kings;’ but, God be thanked, he is now pretty well baffled at his own weapons. When one has to do with a Philosopher of this kind, one should remember the old Gentleman’s saying, who had been engaged in an argument with one of the Roman Emperors. Upon his friend’s telling him, that he wondered he would give up the question, when he had visibly the better of the dispute; ‘I am never ashamed,’ says he, to be confuted by one who is master ‘of fifty Legions.’

I shall but just mention another kind of Reasoning, which may be called arguing by poll; and another which is of equal force, in which wagers are made use of as arguments, according to the celebrated line in Hudibras.

But

But the most notable way of managing a controversy, is that which we may call arguing by torture. This is a method of Reasoning which has been made use of with the poor Refugees, and which was so fashionable in our country during the reign of Queen Mary, that in a passage of an Author quoted by Monsieur Bayle, it is said the price of wood was raised in England, by reason of the executions that were made in Smithfield. These disputants convince their adversaries with a Scrites, commonly called a pile of faggots. The rack is also a kind of Syllogism which has been used with good effect, and has made multitudes of converts. Men were formerly disputed out of their doubts, reconciled to truth by force of reason, and won over to opinions by the candour, sense and ingenuity of those who had the right on their side; but this method of conviction operated too slowly. Pain was found to be much more enlightening than Reason. Every scruple was looked upon as obstinacy, and not to be removed but by several engines invented for that purpose. In a word, the application of whips, racks, gibbets, gallies, dungeons, fire and faggot, in a dispute, may be looked upon as popish refinements upon the old heathen Logic.

There is another way of Reasoning which seldom fails, though it be of a quite different nature to that I have last mentioned. I mean, convincing a man by ready money, or as it is ordinary called, bribing a man to an opinion. This method has often proved successful, when all the others have been made use of to no purpose. A man who is furnished with arguments from the Mint, will convince his antagonist much sooner than one who draws them from Reason and Philosophy. Gold is a wonderful clearer of the understanding; it dissipates every doubt and scruple in an instant; accommodates itself to the meanest capacities; silences the loud and clamorous, and brings over the most obstinate and inflexible. Philip of Macedon was a man of most invincible reason this way. He refuted by it all the wisdom of Athens, confounded their Statesmen, struck their Orators dumb, and at length argued them out of all their liberties.
all

Having here touched upon the several methods of disputing, as they have prevailed in different ages of the world, I shall very suddenly give my reader an account of the whole art of cavilling; which shall be a full and satisfactory answer to all such papers and pamphlets as have yet appeared against the SPECTATOR. C

N^o 240 Wednesday, December 5.

—Aliter not fit, Avite, liber. Mart. Ep. 17. l. 1.

Of such materials, Sir, are books compos'd.

MR. SPECTATOR,

I Am of one of the most genteel trades in the city, and understand thus much of liberal education, as to have an ardent ambition of being useful to mankind, and to think that the chief end of Being as to this life. I had these good impressions given me from the handsom behaviour of a learned, generous, and wealthy man, towards me when I first began the world. Some dissatisfaction between me and my parents made me enter into it with less relish of business than I ought; and to turn off this uneasiness I gave myself to criminal pleasures, some excesses, and a general loose conduct. I know not what the excellent man above-mentioned saw in me, but he descended from the superiority of his wisdom and merit, to throw himself frequently into my company. This made me soon hope that I had something in me worth cultivating, and his conversation made me sensible of satisfactions in a regular way, which I had never before

‘ before imagined. When he was grown familiar with me, he opened himself like a good Angel, and told me, he had long laboured to ripen me into a preparation to receive his friendship and advice, both which I should daily command, and the use of any part of his fortune, to apply the measures he should propose to me, for the improvement of my own. I assure you, I cannot recollect the goodness and confusion of the good man when he spoke to this purpose to me, without melting into tears; but in a word, Sir, I must hasten to tell you, that my heart burns with gratitude towards him, and he is so happy a man, that it can never be in my power to return him his favours in kind, but I am sure I have made him the most agreeable satisfaction I could possibly, in being ready to serve others to my utmost ability, as far as is consistent with the prudence he prescribes to me. Dear Mr. SPECTATOR, I do not owe to him only the good-will and esteem of my own relations, (who are people of distinction) the present ease and plenty of my circumstances, but also the government of my passions, and regulation of my desires. I doubt not, Sir, but in your imagination such virtues as these of my worthy friend, bear as great a figure as actions which are more glittering in the common estimation. What I would ask of you, is to give us a whole Spectator upon heroic virtue in common life, which may incite men to the same generous inclinations,

‘ as

‘ as have by this admirable person been shewn ‘ to, and raised in,

Sir,

Your most humble servant.

MR. SPECTATOR,

‘ I Am a country Gentleman, of a good plentiful estate, and live as the rest of my neighbours with great hospitality. I have been ever reckoned among the Ladies the best company in the world, and have access as a sort of favourite. I never came in public but I saluted them, though in great assemblies, all around, where it was seen how genteelly I avoided hampering my spurs in their petticoats, whilst I moved amongst them; and on the other side how prettily they curtsied and received me, standing in proper rows, and advancing as fast as they saw their elders, or their betters, dispatched by me. But so it is, MR. SPECTATOR, that all our good-breeding is of late lost by the unhappy arrival of a Courtier, or Town Gentleman, who came lately among us: This person wherever he came into a room made a profound bow, and fell back, then recovered with a soft air, and made a bow to the next, and so on to one or two more, and then took the gross of the room, by passing by them in a continued bow until he arrived at the person he thought proper particularly to entertain. This he did with ‘ so

' so good a grace and assurance, that it is taken
 ' for the present fashion; and there is no young
 ' Gentlewoman within several miles of this place
 ' has been kissed ever since his first appearance
 ' among us. We country Gentlemen cannot ' begin again and learn these fine and reserved
 ' airs; and our conversation is at a stand, until
 ' we have your judgment for or against kissing,
 ' by way of civility or salutation; which is im-
 ' patiently expected by your friends of both ' Sexes, but by none so much as

Your humble servant,

Rustic Sprightly.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

Decemb. 3, 1711.

' I Was the other night, at Philaster, where
 ' I expected to hear your famous Trunk-
 ' maker, but was unhappily disappointed of ' his company, and saw another person who ' had the like ambition to distinguish himself
 ' in a noisy manner, partly by vociferation or ' talking loud, and partly by his bodily agility.
 ' This was a very lusty fellow, but withal a ' sort of Béau, who getting into one of the ' side-boxes on the stage before the curtain
 ' drew, was disposed to shew the whole audience
 ' his activity by leaping over the spikes; he ' passed from thence to one of the entering
 ' doors, where he took snuff with a tolerable
 ' good grace, displayed his fine clothes, made
 ' two or three feint passes at the curtain with
 ' his

‘ his cane, then faced about and appeared at ‘ the other door: Here he affected to survey
‘ the whole house, bowed and smiled at random, ‘ and then shewed his teeth, which were some ‘ of them indeed very white: After this he ‘ retired behind the curtain, and obliged us ‘ with several views of his person from every ‘ opening.

‘ During the time of acting, he appeared ‘ frequently in the Prince’s apartment, made one ‘ at the hunting-match, and was very forward ‘ in the rebellion. If there were no injunctions ‘ to the contrary, yet this practice must be con‘ fessed to diminish the pleasure of the audience, ‘ and for that reason presumptuous and un‘ warrantable: But since her Majesty’s late com‘ mand has made it criminal, you have autho‘ rity to take notice of it.

Sir,

Your humble servant,

Charles Easy.

N^o 241 Thursday, December 6.

————— Semperque relinqui
Sola sibi, semper longam incommittata videtur Ire viam ————— Virg. Æn. 4. v. 466.

————— She seems alone
 To wander in her sleep through ways unknown, Guideless and dark. DRYDEN.

MR. SPECTATOR,

‘ THOUGH you have considered virtuous ‘ Love in most of its distresses, I do not ‘ remember that you have given us any disserta‘ tion upon the Absence of Lovers, or laid down ‘ any methods how they should support them‘ selves under those long separations which they ‘ are sometimes forced to undergo. I am at pre‘ sent in this unhappy circumstance, having parted ‘ with the best of husbands, who is abroad in the ‘ service of his country, and may not possibly ‘ return for some years. His warm and gene‘ rous affection while we were together, with ‘ the tenderness which he expressed to me at ‘ parting, make his absence almost insupport‘ able. I think of him every moment of the ‘ day, and meet him every night in my Dreams.
 ‘ Every thing I see puts me in mind of him.
 ‘ I apply myself with more than ordinary ‘ diligence to the care of his family and his ‘ estate;

‘ estate; but this, instead of relieving me, ‘ gives me but so many occasions of wishing for ‘ his return. I frequent the rooms where I ‘ used to converse with him, and not meeting ‘ him there, sit down in his chair, and fall ‘ a weeping. I love to read the books he ‘ delighted in, and to converse with the persons ‘ whom he esteemed. I visit his Picture a ‘ hundred times a day, and place myself over-‘ against it whole hours together. I pass a ‘ great part of my time in the walks where ‘ I used to lean upon his arm, and recollect ‘ in my mind the discourses which have there ‘ passed between us: I look over the several ‘ prospects and points of view which we used ‘ to survey together, fix my eye upon the objects ‘ which he has made me take notice of, and ‘ call to mind a thousand agreeable remarks ‘ which he has made on those occasions. I ‘ write to him by every conveyance, and ‘ contrary to other people, am always in good-‘ humour when an east-wind blows, because ‘ it seldom fails of bringing me a Letter from ‘ him. Let me intreat you, Sir, to give me ‘ your advice upon this occasion, and to let me ‘ know how I may relieve myself in this my ‘ widowhood.

I am, Sir,

Your very humble servant,

ASTERIA.

Absence is what the Poets call death in Love, and has given occasion to abundance of beautiful complaints in those Authors who have treated of this passion in verse. Ovid's Epistles are full of them. Otway's Monimia talks very tenderly upon this subject.

——— It was not kind
To leave me like a Turtle, here alone,
To droop and mourn the absence of my mate.
When thou art from me, every place is desert:
And I, methinks, am savage and forlorn.
Thy presence only 'tis can make me blest,
Heal my unquiet mind, and tune my Soul.

The consolations of Lovers on these occasions are very extraordinary. Besides those mentioned by Asteria, there are many other motives of comfort, which are made use of by absent Lovers.

I remember in one of Scudery's Romances, a couple of honourable Lovers agreed at their parting to set aside one half hour in the day to think of each other during a tedious Absence. The Romance tells us, that they both of them punctually observed the time thus agreed upon; and that whatever company or business they were engaged in, they left it abruptly as soon as the clock warned them to retire. The Romance further adds, that the Lovers expected the return of this stated hour with as much impatience, as if it had been a real assignation, and enjoyed an imaginary happiness that was almost as pleasing to them as what they would have found found from a real meeting. It was an inexpressible satisfaction to these divided Lovers, to be assured that each was at the same time employed in the same kind of contemplation, and making equal returns of tenderness and affection.

If I may be allowed to mention a more serious expedient for the alleviating of Absence, I shall take notice of one which I have known two persons practise, who joined Religion to that elegance of sentiments with which the passion of Love generally inspires its votaries. This was, at the return of such an hour, to offer up a certain prayer for each other, which they had agreed upon before their parting. The husband, who is a man that makes a figure in the polite world, as well as in his own family, has often told me, that he could not have supported an Absence of three years without this expedient.

Strada, in one of his Prolusions, gives an account of a chimerical correspondence between two friends by the help of a certain Loadstone, which had such virtue in it, that if it touched two several needles, when one of the needles so touched began to move, the other, though at never so great a distance, moved at the same time, and in the same manner. He tells us, that the two friends, being each of them possessed of one of these needles, made a kind of a dial-plate, inscribing it with the four and twenty letters, in the same manner as the hours of the day are marked upon the ordinary dial-plate. They then fixed one of the needles on each of these plates in such a manner, that it could move round without impediment, so as to touch any of the four and twenty letters. Upon their separating from one another into distant Countries, they agreed to withdraw themselves punctually into their closets at a certain hour of the day, and to converse with one another by means of this their invention. Accordingly when they were some hundred miles asunder, each of them shut himself up in his closet at the time appointed, and immediately cast his eye upon his dial-plate. If he had a mind to write any thing to his friend, he directed his needle to every letter that formed the words which he had occasion for, making a little pause at the end of every word or sentence, to avoid confusion. The friend, in the mean while, saw his own sympathetic needle moving of itself to every letter which that of his correspondent pointed at. By this means they talked together across a whole continent, and conveyed their thoughts to one another in an instant over cities or mountains, seas or deserts.

D d 3

ordinary

If Monsieur Scudery, or any other writer of Romance, had introduced a Necromancer, who is generally in the train of a Knight-errant, making a present to two Lovers of a couple of these above-mentioned needles, the reader would not have been a little pleased to have seen them corresponding with one another another when they were guarded by spies and watches, or separated by castles and adventures.

In the mean while, if ever this invention should be revived or put in practice, I would propose, that upon the Lover's dial-plate there should be written not only the four and twenty letters, but several intire words which have always a place in passionate epistles, as Flames, Darts, Die, Languish, Absence, Cupid, Heart, Eyes, Hang, Drown, and the like. This would very much abridge the Lover's pains in this way of writing a Letter, as it would enable him to express the most useful and significant words with a single touch of the needle. C

N^o 242 Friday, December 7.

Creditur, ex medio quia res arcessit, habere Sudoris minimum—— Hor. Ep. I. l. 2. v. 168.

To write on vulgar themes, is thought an easy task.

MR. SPECTATOR,

YOUR Speculations do not so generally prevail over mens manners as I could wish. A former Paper of yours concerning the misbehaviour of people, who are necessarily in each other's company in travelling, ought to have been a lasting admonition against transgressions of that kind: But I had the fate of your Quaker, in meeting with a rude fellow in a stage-coach, who entertained two or three women of us (for there was no man besides himself) with language as indecent as ever was heard upon the water. The impertinent observations which the Coxcomb made upon our shame and confusion were such, that it is an unspeakable grief to reflect upon them. As much as you have declaimed against duelling, I hope you will do us the justice to declare, that if the brute has courage enough to send to the place where he saw us all alight together to get rid of him, there is not one of us but has a Lover who shall avenge the insult. It would certainly

‘ tainly be worth your consideration, to look ‘ into the frequent misfortunes of this kind,
‘ to which the modest and innocent are ex‘ posed, by the licentious behaviour of such as ‘ are as much strangers to good-breeding as to ‘ virtue. Could we avoid hearing what we do ‘ not approve, as easily as we can seeing what ‘ is disagreeable, there were some consolation ;
‘ but since in a box at a Play, in an assembly
‘ of Ladies, or even in a pew at Church, it ‘ is in the power of a gross Coxcomb to utter ‘ what a woman cannot avoid hearing, how ‘ miserable is her condition who comes within ‘ the power of such impertinents ? And how ‘ necessary is it to repeat invectives against such ‘ a behaviour ? If the licentious had not utterly ‘ forgot what it is to be modest, they would ‘ know that offended modesty labours under ‘ one of the greatest sufferings to which hu‘ man life can be exposed. If one of these ‘ brutes could reflect thus much, though they ‘ want shame, they would be moved by their ‘ pity, to abhor an impudent behaviour in the ‘ presence of the chaste and innocent. If you ‘ will oblige us with a Spectator on this subject, ‘ and procure it to be pasted against every stage-‘ coach in Great Britain, as the law of the ‘ journey, you will highly oblige the whole Sex, ‘ for which you have professed so great an esteem ;
‘ and in particular, the two Ladies my late fel‘ low-sufferers, and, Sir,

Your most humble servant,

Rebecca Ridinghood.

MR. SPECTATOR,

THE matter which I am now going to send you, is an unhappy story in low life, and will recommend itself, so that you must excuse the manner of expressing it. A poor idle drunken weaver in Spittle-Fields has a faithful laborious wife, who by her frugality and industry had laid by her as much money as purchased her a Ticket in the present Lottery. She had hid this very privately in the bottom of a trunk, and had given her number to a friend and confidant, who had promised to keep the secret, and bring her news of the success. The poor adventurer was one day gone abroad, when her careless husband, suspecting she had saved some money, searches every corner, until at length he finds this same Ticket; which he immediately carries abroad, sells, and squanders away the money without the wife's suspecting any thing of the matter. A day or two after this, this friend who was a woman, comes and brings the wife word, that she had a benefit of five hundred pounds. The poor creature overjoyed, flies up stairs to her husband, who was then at work, and desires him to leave his Loom for that evening, and come and drink with a friend of his and hers below. The man received this cheerful invitation as bad husbands sometimes do, and after a cross word or two, told her he would not come. His wife with tenderness renewed her importunity, and at length said to him, my ‘ my Love ! I have within these few months, un‘ known to you, scraped together as much money ‘ as has bought us a Ticket in the Lottery, and ‘ now here is Mrs. Quick come to tell me, that it ‘ is come up this morning a five hundred pound ‘ prize. The husband replies immediately, you ‘ lie, you slut, you have no Ticket, for I have ‘ sold it. The poor woman upon this faints away ‘ in a fit, recovers, and is now run distracted.

‘ As she had no design to defraud her husband,
‘ but was willing only to participate in his good ‘ fortune, every one pities her, but thinks her ‘ husband’s punishment but just. This, Sir, is ‘ matter of fact, and would, if the persons and ‘ circumstances were greater, in a well-wrought ‘ play be called Beautiful Distress. I have only ‘ sketched it out with chalk, and know a good ‘ hand can make a moving picture with worse ‘ materials.

Sir, &c.

MR. SPECTATOR,

‘ I Am what the world calls a warm fellow,
‘ and by good success in trade I have raised ‘ myself to a capacity of making some figure in ‘ the world ; but no matter for that. I have ‘ now under my guardianship a couple of Nieces, ‘ who will certainly make me run mad ; which ‘ you will not wonder at, when I tell you they ‘ are female Virtuoso’s, and during the three years ‘ and a half that I have had them under my ‘ care, they never in the least inclined their ‘ thoughts towards any one single part of the ‘ character

‘ of a notable woman. Whilst they should ‘ have been considering the proper ingredients ‘ for a sack-poffet, you should hear a dispute ‘ concerning the magnetic virtue of the load-‘ stone, or perhaps the pressure of the atmos‘ phere: Their language is peculiar to them‘ selves, and they scorn to express themselves ‘ on the meanest trifle with words that are not ‘ of a Latin derivation. But this were support‘ able still, would they suffer me to enjoy an ‘ uninterrupted ignorance; but, unless I fall in ‘ with their abstracted ideas of things (as they ‘ call them) I must not expect to smoke one ‘ pipe in quiet. In a late fit of the gout I ‘ complained of the pain of that distemper, ‘ when my Niece Kitty begged leave to assure ‘ me, that whatever I might think, several great ‘ Philosophers, both ancient and modern, were ‘ of opinion, that both pleasure and pain were ‘ imaginary distinctions, and that there was no ‘ such thing as either in rerum natura. I have ‘ often heard them affirm that the fire was not ‘ hot; and one day when I, with the autho‘ rity of an old fellow, desired one of them to ‘ put my blue cloke on my knees, she answered, ‘ Sir, I will reach the cloke; but take notice, ‘ I do not do it as allowing your description;
‘ for it might as well be called yellow as blue;
‘ for colour is nothing but the various infractions
‘ of the rays of the sun. Miss Molly told me ‘ one day; that to say snow was white, is allow‘ ing a vulgar error; for as it contains a great ‘ quantity of nitrous particles, it might more ‘ reason-

‘ reasonably be supposed to be black. In short, ‘ the young huffeys would persuade me, that ‘ to believe one’s eyes is a sure way to be de‘ ceived; and have often advised me, by no ‘ means, to trust any thing so fallible as my ‘ senses. What I have to beg of you now is,
‘ to turn one Speculation to the due regulation ‘ of female literature, so far at least, as to make ‘ it consistent with the quiet of such whose fate ‘ it is to be liable to its insults; and to tell ‘ us the difference between a Gentleman that ‘ should make Cheefecakes and raise Paste, and ‘ a Lady that reads Locke, and understands the ‘ Mathematics. In which you will extremely ‘ oblige

Your hearty friend and humble servant,

T

Abraham Thrifty.

N^o 243 Saturday, December 8.

Formam quidem ipsam, Marce fili, & tanquam faciem honesti vides: quæ si oculis cerneretur, mirabiles amores (ut ait Plato) excitaret sapientiæ. Tull. Offic.

You see, my son Marcus, the very shape and countenance, as it were, of Virtue; which if it could be made the object of sight, would (as Plato says) excite in us a wonderful love of wisdom.

I Do not remember to have read any discourse written expressly upon the beauty and loveliness of Virtue, without considering it as a duty, and as the means of making us happy both now and hereafter. I design therefore this Speculation as an Essay upon that subject, in which I shall consider Virtue no farther than as it is in itself of an amiable nature, after having premised, that I understand by the word Virtue such a general notion as is affixed to it by the writers of morality, and which by devout men generally goes under the name of religion, and by men of the world under the name of honour.

Hypocrisy itself does great honour, or rather justice, to religion, and tacitly acknowledges it to be an ornament to human nature. The hypocrite would not be at so much pains to put on the appearance of Virtue, if he did not know it was the most proper and effectual means to gain the love and esteem of mankind.
on

We learn from Hierocles, it was a common saying among the Heathens, that the wise man hates no body, but only loves the virtuous.

Tully has a very beautiful gradation of thoughts to shew how amiable Virtue is. We love a virtuous man, says he, who lives in the remotest parts of the earth, though we are altogether out of the reach of his Virtue, and can receive from it no manner of benefit; nay one who died several ages ago, raises a secret fondness and benevolence for him in our minds, when we read his story: Nay what is still more, one who has been the enemy of our country, provided his wars were regulated by justice and humanity, as in the instance of Pyrrhus, whom Tully mentions on this occasion in opposition to Hannibal. Such is the natural beauty and loveliness of Virtue.

Stoicism, which was the pedantry of Virtue, ascribes all good qualifications, of what kind soever, to the virtuous man. Accordingly Cato, in the character Tully has left of him, carried matters so far, that he would not allow any one but a virtuous man to be handsome. This indeed looks more like a philosophical rant than the real opinion of a wise man; yet this was what Cato very seriously maintained. In short, the Stoics thought they could not sufficiently represent the excellence of Virtue, if they did not

not comprehend in the notion of it all possible perfections ; and therefore did not only suppose, that it was transcendently beautiful in itself, but that it made the very body amiable, and banished every kind of deformity from the person in whom it resided.

It is a common observation, that the most abandoned to all sense of goodness, are apt to wish those who are related to them of a different character ; and it is very observable, that none are more struck with the charms of Virtue in the fair Sex, than those who by their very admiration of it are carried to a desire of ruining it.

A virtuous mind in a fair body is indeed a fine picture in a good light, and therefore it is no wonder that it makes the beautiful Sex all over charms.

As Virtue in general is of an amiable and lovely nature, there are some particular kinds of it which are more so than others, and these are such as dispose us to do good to mankind. Temperance and abstinence, faith and devotion, are in themselves perhaps as laudable as any other virtues ; but those which make a man popular and beloved, are justice, charity, munificence, and, in short, all the good qualities that render us beneficial to each other. For which reason even an extravagant man, who has nothing else to recommend him but a false generosity, is often more beloved and esteemed than a person of a much more finished

finished character, who is defective in this particular.

The two great ornaments of Virtue, which shew her in the most advantageous views, and make her altogether lovely, are chearfulness and good-nature. These generally go together, as a man cannot be agreeable to others who is not easy within himself. They are both very requisite in a virtuous mind, to keep out melancholy from the many serious thoughts it is engaged in, and to hinder its natural hatred of vice from souring into severity and censoriousness.

If Virtue is of this amiable nature, what can we think of those who can look upon it with an eye of hatred and ill-will, or can suffer their aversion for a party to blot out all the merit of the person who is engaged in it. A man must be excessively stupid, as well as uncharitable, who believes that there is no Virtue but on his own side, and that there are not men as honest as himself who may differ from him in political principles. Men may oppose one another in some particulars, but ought not to carry their hatred to those qualities which are of so amiable a nature in themselves, and have nothing to do with the points in dispute. Men of Virtue, though of different interests, ought to consider themselves as more nearly united with one another, than with the vicious part of mankind, who embark with them in the same civil concerns. We should bear the same love towards a man of honour, who is a living antagonist, which Tully tells us in the forementioned passage every one naturally does to an enemy that is dead. In short, we should esteem Virtue though in a foe, and abhor Vice though in a friend.

I speak this with an eye to those cruel treatments which men of all sides are apt to give the characters of those who do not agree with them. How many persons of undoubted probity, and exemplary virtue, on either side, are blackened and defamed? How many men of honour exposed to public obloquy and reproach? Those therefore who are either the instruments or abettors in such infernal dealings, ought to be looked upon as persons who make use of religion to promote their cause, not of their cause to promote religion.

C

N^o 244 Monday, December 10.

——— Judex & callidus audis.

Hor. Sat. 7. l. 2. v. 101.

A judge of painting you, and man of skill.

CREECH.

Covent-Garden, Decemb. 7.

MR. SPECTATOR,

I Cannot, without a double injustice, forbear expressing to you the satisfaction which a whole clan of Virtuofos have received from those hints which you have lately given the town on the Cartons of the inimitable Raphael.
 It should be methinks the business of a SPEC-TATOR, to improve the pleasures of sight, and there cannot be a more immediate way to it than recommending the study and observation of excellent drawings and pictures.
 when I first went to view those of Raphael which you have celebrated, I must confess I was but barely pleased; the next time I liked them better, but at last as I grew better acquainted with them, I fell deeply in love with them, like wise speeches they sunk deep into my heart; for you know, Mr. SPEC-TATOR, that a man of wit may extremely E e 2 affect ‘ affect one for the present, but if he has ‘ not discretion, his merit soon vanishes away, ‘ while a wise man that has not so great a stock ‘ of wit, shall nevertheless give you a far greater ‘ and more lasting satisfaction: Just so it is in a ‘ picture that is smartly touched but not well ‘ studied; one may call it a witty picture, ‘ though the Painter in the mean time may ‘ be in danger of being called a fool. On ‘ the other hand, a picture that is thoroughly ‘ understood in the whole, and well performed ‘ in the particulars, that is begun on the foun‘ dation of geometry, carried on by the rules ‘ of perspective, architecture, and anatomy, ‘ and perfected by a good harmony, a just ‘ and natural colouring, and such passions, and ‘ expressions of the mind as are almost pecu‘ liar to Raphael; this is what you may justly ‘ stile a wise picture, and which seldom fails ‘ to strike us dumb, until we can assemble ‘ all our faculties to make but a tolerable ‘ judgment upon it. Other pictures are made ‘ for the eyes only, as rattles are made for ‘ children’s ears; and certainly that picture ‘ that only pleases the eye, without represent‘ ing some well-chosen part of nature or other, ‘ does but shew what fine colours are to be ‘ sold at the colour-shop, and mocks the ‘ works of the Creator. If the best imitator ‘ of nature, is not to be esteemed the best ‘ painter, but he that makes the greatest show ‘ and glare of colours; it will necessarily follow, ‘ that

‘ that he who can array himself in the most ‘ gaudy draperies is best dressed, and he that ‘ can speak loudest the best Orator. Every man ‘ when he looks on a picture should examine ‘ it according to that share of reason he is ‘ master of, or he will be in danger of ‘ making a wrong judgment. If men as they ‘ walk abroad would make more frequent ob‘ servations on those beauties of nature which ‘ every moment present themselves to their ‘ view, they would be better judges when they ‘ saw her well imitated at home: This would ‘ help to correct those errors which most pre-‘ tenders fall into, who are over-hasty in their ‘ judgments, and will not stay to let reason ‘ come in for a share in the decision. It is for ‘ want of this that men mistake in this case,
‘ and in common life, a wild extravagant pencil ‘ for one that is truly bold and great, an impu‘ dent fellow for a man of true courage and ‘ bravery, hasty and unreasonable actions for ‘ enterprizes of spirit and resolution, gaudy ‘ colouring for that which is truly beautiful, a ‘ false and insinuating discourse for simple truth ‘ elegantly recommended. The parallel will ‘ hold through all the parts of life and paint‘ ing too; and the Virtuofos above-mentioned ‘ will be glad to see you draw it with your ‘ terms of art. As the shadows in Picture ‘ represent the serious or melancholy, so the ‘ lights do the bright and lively thoughts: As ‘ there should be but one forcible light in a ‘ picture which should catch the eye and fall ‘ on the hero, so there should be but one ‘ object of our love, even the Author of nature.

 ‘ These and the like reflexions well improved, ‘ might very much contribute to open the ‘ beauty of that art, and prevent young people ‘ from being poisoned by the ill Gusto of an ‘ extravagant workman that should be imposed ‘ upon us.

I am, Sir,

Your most humble servant.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

‘ THOUGH I am a woman, yet I am ‘ one of those who confess themselves ‘ highly pleased with a Speculation you obliged ‘ the world with some time ago, from an old ‘ Greek Poet you call Simonides, in relation ‘ to the several natures and distinctions of our ‘ own Sex. I could not but admire how ‘ justly the characters of women in this age, ‘ fall in with the times of Simonides, there ‘ being no one of those sorts I have not at ‘ some time or other of my life met with a ‘ sample of. But, Sir, the subject of this pre‘ sent address, are a set of women compre‘ hended, I think, in the ninth species of that ‘ Speculation, called the Apes; the description ‘ of whom I find to be, “ that they are such ‘ as are both ugly and ill-natured, who have ‘ nothing beautiful themselves, and endeavour

“ to detract from or ridicule every thing that “ appears so in others.” Now, Sir, this sect, “ as I have been told, is very frequent in the “ great town where you live; but as my cir“ cumstance of life obliges me to reside alto“ gether in the country, though not many “ miles from London, I cannot have met with “ a great number of them, nor indeed is it “ a desirable acquaintance, as I have lately “ found by experience. You must know, Sir, “ that at the beginning of this summer a family “ of these Apes came and settled for the sea“ son not far from the place where I live.
“ As they were strangers in the country, they “ were visited by the Ladies about them, of “ whom I was one, with an humanity usual in “ those that pass most of their time in soli“ tude. The Apes lived with us very agree“ ably our own way until towards the end of “ the summer, when they began to bethink “ themselves of returning to town; then it was, “ Mr. SPECTATOR, that they began to set “ themselves about the proper and distinguish“ ing business of their character; and, as it is “ said of evil spirits, that they are apt to carry “ away a piece of the house they are about to “ leave, the Apes, without regard to common “ mercy, civility, or gratitude, thought fit to “ mimic and fall foul on the faces, dress, and “ behaviour of their innocent neighbours, be“ stowing abominable censures and disgraceful “ appellations commonly called Nick-names,

‘ on all of them; and in short, like true ‘ fine Ladies, made their honest plainness
‘ and sincerity matter of ridicule. I could not ‘ but acquaint you with these grievances, as ‘ well at the desire of all the parties injured, ‘ as from my own inclination. I hope, Sir, if ‘ you cannot propose intirely to reform this evil, ‘ you will take such notice of it in some of your ‘ future Speculations, as may put the deserving ‘ part of our Sex on their guard against these ‘ creatures; and at the same time the Apes may ‘ be sensible, that this sort of mirth is so far from ‘ an innocent diversion, that it is in the highest ‘ degree that vice which is said to comprehend ‘ all others.

I-am, Sir,

Your humble servant,

T

Constantia Field,

Tuesday,

N^o 245 Tuesday, December 11.

Ficta voluptatis causâ sint proxima veris.

Hor. Ars Poet. v. 338.

Fictions, to please, should wear the face of truth.

THERE is nothing which one regards so much with an eye of mirth and pity as Innocence, when it has in it a dash of folly. At the same time that one esteems the virtue, one is tempted to laugh at the simplicity which accompanies it. When a man is made up wholly of the Dove, without the least grain of the Serpent in his composition, he becomes ridiculous in many circumstances of life, and very often discredits his best actions. The Cordeliers tell a story of their founder Saint Francis, that as he passed the streets in the dusk of the evening, he discovered a young fellow with a maid in a corner; upon which the good man, say they, lifted up his hands to heaven with a secret thanksgiving, that there was still so much christian charity in the world. The innocence of the Saint made him mistake the kiss of a Lover for a salute of Charity. I am heartily concerned when I see a virtuous man without a competent knowledge of the world; and if there be any use in these my Papers, it is this, that without representing vice under any false alluring alluring notions, they give my reader an insight into the ways of men, and represent human nature in all its changeable colours. The man who has not been engaged in any of the follies of the world, or, as Shakespear expresses it, 'hackneyed in the ways of men,' may here find a picture of its follies and extravagancies. The virtuous and the innocent may know in speculation what they could never arrive at by practice, and by this means avoid the snares of the crafty, the corruptions of the vicious, and the reasonings of the prejudiced. Their minds may be opened without being vitiated.

It is with an eye to my following correspondent, Mr. Timothy Doodle, who seems a very well-meaning man, that I have written this short preface, to which I shall subjoin a Letter from the said Mr. Doodle.

S I R,

I Could heartily wish that you would let us know your opinion upon several innocent diversions which are in use among us, and which are very proper to pass away a winter night for those who do not care to throw away their time at an Opera, or at the Play-house. I would gladly know in particular, what notion you have of hot-cockles; as also whether you think that questions and commands, mottoes, similes, and cross-purposes have not more mirth and wit in them, than those public diversions which are grown so very fashionable among us. If you would recommend to our wives and daughters, ters, who read your Papers with a great deal of pleasure, some of those sports and pastimes that may be practised within doors, and by the fire-side, we who are masters of families should be hugely obliged to you. I need not tell you that I would have these sports and pastimes not only merry but innocent, for which reason I have not mentioned either whisk or lanterloo, nor indeed so much as one-and-thirty. After having communicated to you my request upon this subject, I will be so free as to tell you how my wife and I pass away these tedious winter-evenings with a great deal of pleasure. Though she be young and handsome, and good-humoured to a miracle, she does not care for gadding abroad like others of her Sex. There is a very friendly man, a Colonel in the army, whom I am mightily obliged to for his civilities, that comes to see me almost every night; for he is not one of those giddy young fellows that cannot live out of a Play-house. When we are together, we very often make a party at blind-man's buff which is a sport that I like the better, because there is a good deal of exercise in it. The Colonel and I are blinded by turns, and you would laugh your heart out to see what pains my Dear takes to hoodwink us, so that it is impossible for us to see the least glimpse of light. The poor Colonel sometimes hits his nose against a post, and makes us die with laughing. I have generally the good luck not to hurt myself, but am very often above half

‘ half an hour before I can catch either of them ; ‘ for you must know we hide ourselves up and ‘ down in corners, that we may have the more ‘ sport. I only give you this hint as a sample ‘ of such innocent diversions as I would have ‘ you recommend ; and am,

Most esteemed Sir,

Your ever loving friend,

Timothy Doodle.

The following Letter was occasioned by my last Thursday's Paper upon the absence of Lovers, and the methods therein mentioned of making such absence supportable.

S I R,

‘ Among the several ways of consolation which ‘ absent Lovers make use of while their ‘ Souls are in that state of departure, which ‘ you say is Death in Love, there are some very ‘ material ones that have escaped your notice.
 ‘ Among these, the first and most received is ‘ a crooked shilling, which has administered great ‘ comfort to our forefathers, and is still made ‘ use of on this occasion with very good effect in ‘ most parts of her Majesty's dominions. There ‘ are some, I know, who think a crown-piece ‘ cut into two equal parts, and preserved by ‘ the distant Lovers, is of more sovereign virtue ‘ than the former. But since opinions are di‘ vided in this particular, why may not the ‘ same

‘ same persons make use of both? The figure ‘ of a heart, whether cut in stone or cast in ‘ metal, whether bleeding upon an Altar, stuck ‘ with darts, or held in the hand of a Cupid, ‘ has always been looked upon as talismanic
‘ in distresses of this nature. I am acquainted ‘ with many a brave fellow, who carries his ‘ mistress in the lid of his snuff-box, and by ‘ that expedient has supported himself under the ‘ absence of a whole campaign. For my own ‘ part, I have tried all these remedies, but never ‘ found so much benefit from any as from a ‘ ring, in which my mistress’s hair is platted ‘ together very artificially in a kind of True-‘ Lover’s knot. As I have received great benefit ‘ from this secret, I think myself obliged to ‘ communicate it to the public, for the good ‘ of my fellow subjects. I desire you will add ‘ this Letter as an appendix to your consolations ‘ upon absence, and am,

Your very humble servant,

T. B.

I shall conclude this Paper with a Letter from an University Gentleman, occasioned by my last Tuesday’s Paper, wherein I gave some account of the great feuds which happened formerly in those learned bodies, between the modern Greeks and Trojans.

SIR,

S I R,

‘ THIS will give you to understand, that ‘ there is at present in the society, whereof ‘ I am a member, a very considerable body of ‘ Trojans, who, upon a proper occasion, would ‘ not fail to declare ourselves. In the mean ‘ while we do all we can to annoy our enemies ‘ by stratagem, and are resolved by the first op‘ portunity to attack Mr. Joshua Barnes, whom ‘ we look upon as the Achilles of the opposite ‘ party. As for myself, I have had the repu‘ tation ever since I came from school, of being ‘ a trusty Trojan, and am resolved never to give ‘ quarter to the smallest particle of Greek, where-‘ ever I chance to meet it. It is for this reason ‘ I take it very ill of you, that you sometimes ‘ hang out Greek colours at the head of your ‘ Paper, and sometimes give a word of the ‘ enemy even in the body of it. When I meet ‘ with any thing of this nature, I throw down ‘ your Speculations upon the table, with that ‘ form of words which we make use of when ‘ we declare war upon an Author.

Græcum est, non potest legi.

‘ I give you this hint, that you may for the ‘ future abstain from any such hostilities at your ‘ peril.

C

Troilus.

Wednesday,

N^o 246 Wednesday, December 12.

—Οὐκ ἄρα σοί γε πατήρ ἦν ἱππότα Πηλεὺς,
 Οὐδὲ Θέτις μήτηρ, γλαυκὴ δὲ σ' ἔτιμ' ἐξέλασσε, Πέτραι τ' ἤλιστατοι, ὅτι τοι νότος ἐστὶν ἀπηνής.

Hom. Il. 16. v. 33.

No amorous Hero ever gave thee birth,
 Nor ever tender Goddess brought thee forth:
 Some rugged rock's hard entrails gave thee form,
 And raging seas produc'd thee in a storm:
 A Soul well suiting thy tempestuous kind,
 So rough thy manners, so untam'd thy mind.

POPE.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

AS your Paper is part of the equipage of the tea-table, I conjure you to print what I now write to you; for I have no other way to communicate what I have to say to the fair Sex on the most important circumstance of life, even the care of children.
 I do not understand that you profess your Paper is always to consist of matters which are only to entertain the learned and polite, but that it may agree with your design to publish some which may tend to the information of mankind in general; and when it does so, you do more than writing wit and humour. Give me leave then to tell you, that of all the abuses that ever you have as yet endeavoured

‘ to reform, certainly not one wanted so much ‘ your assistance as the abuse in nursing children.
‘ It is unmerciful to see, that a woman endowed ‘ with all the perfections and blessings of nature, ‘ can, as soon as she is delivered, turn off her ‘ innocent, tender, and helpless infant, and give ‘ it up to a woman that is (ten thousand to one) ‘ neither in health nor good condition, neither ‘ sound in mind nor body, that has neither ‘ honour nor reputation, neither love nor pity ‘ for the poor babe, but more regard for the ‘ money than for the child, and never will take ‘ farther care of it than what by all the en‘ couragement of money and presents she is ‘ forced to; like Æscop’s earth, which would not ‘ nurse the plant of another ground, although ‘ never so much improved, by reason that plant ‘ was not of its own production. And since ‘ another’s child is no more natural to a Nurse ‘ than a plant to a strange and different ground, ‘ how can it be supposed that the child should ‘ thrive; and if it thrives, must it not imbibe
‘ the gross humours and qualities of the Nurse, ‘ like a plant in a different ground, or like a ‘ graft upon a different stock? Do not we ob‘ serve, that a Lamb sucking a Goat changes ‘ very much its nature, nay even its skin and ‘ wool into the Goat kind? The power of a ‘ Nurse over a child, by infusing into it, with ‘ her milk, her qualities and disposition, is ‘ sufficiently and daily observed: Hence came ‘ that old saying concerning an ill-natured and ‘ malicious fellow, that he had imbibed his ‘ malice

malice with his Nurse's milk, or that some brute or other had been his Nurse. Hence Romulus and Remus were said to have been nursed by a Wolf, Telephus the son of Heracles by a Hind, Pelias the son of Neptune by a Mare, and Ægisthus by a Goat; not that they had actually sucked such creatures, as some simpletons have imagined, but that their Nurses had been of such a nature and temper and infused such into them.

Many instances may be produced from good authorities and daily experience, that children actually suck in the several passions and depraved inclinations of their Nurses, as anger, malice, fear, melancholy, sadness, desire, and aversion. This Diodorus, lib. 2. witnesses, when he speaks, saying, That Nero the Emperor's Nurse had been very much addicted to drinking; which habit Nero received from his Nurse, and was so very particular in this, that the people took so much notice of it, as instead of Tiberius Nero, they called him Biberius Mero. The same Diodorus also relates of Caligula, predecessor to Nero, that his Nurse used to moisten the nipples of her breast frequently with blood, to make Caligula take the better hold of them; which, says Diodorus, was the cause that made him so blood-thirsty and cruel all his life-time after, that he not only committed frequent murder by his own hand, but likewise wished that all human kind wore but one neck, that he might have the pleasure to cut it off. Such like degeneracies astonish the ‘ parents, who not knowing after whom the ‘ child can take, see one to incline to stealing, ‘ another to drinking, cruelty, stupidity; yet all ‘ these are not minded. Nay it is easy to de‘ monstrate, that a child, although it be born ‘ from the best of parents, may be corrupted

‘ by an ill-tempered Nurse. How many chil‘ dren do we see daily brought into fits, con‘ sumptions, rickets, &c. merely by sucking their ‘ Nurses when in a passion or fury? But indeed ‘ almost any disorder of the Nurse is a disorder ‘ to the child, and few Nurses can be found ‘ in this town but what labour under some dis‘ temper or other. The first question that is ‘ generally asked a young woman that wants to ‘ be a Nurse, why she should be a nurse to ‘ other people’s children; is answered, by her ‘ having an ill husband, and that she must make ‘ shift to live. I think now this very answer is ‘ enough to give any body a shock, if duly ‘ considered; for an ill husband may, or ten to ‘ one if he does not, bring home to his wife ‘ an ill distemper, or at least vexation and dis‘ turbance. Besides, as she takes the child out ‘ of mere necessity, her food will be accordingly, ‘ or else very coarse at best; whence proceeds ‘ an ill-concocted and coarse food for the child;
‘ for as the blood, so is the milk; and hence I ‘ am very well assured proceeds the scurvy, the ‘ evil, and many other distempers. I beg of ‘ you, for the sake of the many poor infants ‘ that may and will be saved, by weighing this ‘ case seriously, to exhort the people with the ‘ utmost

' utmost vehemence to let the children suck their
' own mothers, both for the benefit of mo' ther and child. For the general argument,
' that a mother is weakened by giving suck to
' her children, is vain and simple ; I will main' tain that the mother grows stronger by it, and ' will have her health better than she would have ' otherwise : She will find it the greatest cure
' and preservative for the vapours and future
' miscarriages, much beyond any other remedy
' whatsoever : Her children will be like giants,
' whereas otherwise they are but living shadows
' and like unripe fruit ; and certainly if a woman
' is strong enough to bring forth a child, she is ' beyond all doubt strong enough to nurse it
' afterwards. It grieves me to observe and con' sider how many poor children are daily ruined
' by careless Nurses ; and yet how tender ought
' they to be of a poor infant, since the least ' hurt or blow, especially upon the head, may ' make it senseless, stupid, or otherwise miserable
' for ever ?

' But I cannot well leave this subject as yet ;
' for it seems to me very unnatural, that a ' woman that has fed a child as part of herself
' for nine months, should have no desire to nurse
' it farther, when brought to light and before
' her eyes, and when by its cry it implores her ' assistance and the office of a mother. Do not
' the very cruellest of brutes tend their young ' ones with all the care and delight imaginable ?
' for how can she be called a mother that will ' not nurse her young ones ? The earth is called ‘ the mother of all things, not because she produces, but because she maintains and nurses what she produces. The generation of the infant is the effect of desire, but the care of it argues virtue and choice. I am not ignorant but that there are some cases of necessity where a mother cannot give suck, and then out of two evils the least must be chosen; but there are so very few, that I am sure in a thousand there is hardly one real instance; for if a woman does but know that her husband can spare about three or six shillings a week extraordinary, (although this is but seldom considered) she certainly, with the assistance of her gossips, will soon persuade the good man to send the child to nurse, and easily impose upon him by pretending indisposition. This cruelty is supported by fashion, and nature gives place to custom.

Sir,

T

Your humble servant.

Thursday,

N^o 247 Thursday, December 13.

——— Τῶν δ' ἀνάματ' ῥέει αὖδ' ἡ Ἐκ στομάτων ἡδεῖα ———

Hesiod.

Their untir'd lips a wordy torrent pour.

WE are told by some ancient Authors, that Socrates was instructed in eloquence by a woman, whose name, if I am not mistaken, was Aspasia. I have indeed very often looked upon that art as the most proper for the female Sex, and I think the Universities would do well to consider whether they should not fill the Rhetoric chairs with She-professors.

It has been said in the praise of some men, that they could talk whole hours together upon any thing; but it must be owned to the honour of the other Sex, that there are many among them who can talk whole hours together upon nothing. I have known a woman branch out into a long extempore dissertation upon the edging of a petticoat, and chide her servant for breaking a china cup, in all the figures of Rhetoric.

Were women admitted to plead in courts of Judicature, I am persuaded they would carry the eloquence of the Bar to greater heights than it has yet arrived at. If any one doubts this, let him but be present at those debates which frequently arise among the Ladies of the British Fishery.

The first kind therefore of female Orators which I shall take notice of, are those who are employed in stirring up the passions, a part of Rhetoric in which Socrates his wife had perhaps made a greater proficiency than his above-mentioned teacher.

The second kind of female Orators are those who deal in invectives, and who are commonly known by the name of the Censorious. The imagination and elocution of this set of rhetoricians is wonderful. With what a fluency of invention, and copiousness of expression, will they enlarge upon every little slip in the behaviour of another? With how many different circumstances, and with what variety of phrases, will they tell over the same story? I have known an old Lady make an unhappy marriage the subject of a month's conversation. She blamed the bride in one place; pitied her in another; laughed at her in a third; wondered at her in a fourth; was angry with her in a fifth; and in short, wore out a pair of coach-horses in expressing her concern for her. At length, after having quite exhausted the subject on this side, she made a visit to the new-married pair, praised the wife for the prudent choice she had made, told her the unreasonable reflexions which some malicious people had cast upon her, and desired that they might be better acquainted. The censure and approbation of this

this kind of women are therefore only to be considered as helps to discourse.

A third kind of female Orators may be comprehended under the word Gossips. Mrs. Fiddle Faddle is perfectly accomplished in this sort of eloquence; she lanches out into descriptions of christenings, runs divisions upon an head-dress, knows every dish of meat that is served up in her neighbourhood, and entertains her company a whole afternoon together with the wit of her little boy, before he is able to speak.

The Coquette may be looked upon as a fourth kind of female Orator. To give herself the larger field for discourse, she hates and loves in the same breath, talks to her lap-dog or parrot, is uneasy in all kinds of weather, and in every part of the room: She has false quarrels and feigned obligations to all the men of her acquaintance; sighs when she is not sad, and laughs when she is not merry. The Coquette is in particular a great mistress of that part of oratory which is called Action, and indeed seems to speak for no other purpose, but as it gives her an opportunity of stirring a limb, or varying a feature, of glancing her eyes, or playing with her fan.

As for news-mongers, politicians, mimicks, story-tellers, with other characters of that nature, which give birth to Loquacity, they are as commonly found among the men as the women; for which reason I shall pass them over in silence.

I have often been puzzled to assign a cause why women should have this talent of a ready utterance in so much greater perfection than men. I have sometimes fancied that they have not a retentive power, or the faculty of suppressing their thoughts, as men have, but that they are necessitated to speak every thing they think, and if so, it would perhaps furnish a very strong argument to the Cartesians, for the supporting of their doctrine, that the Soul always thinks. But as several are of opinion that the fair Sex are not altogether strangers to the art of dissembling and concealing their thoughts, I have been forced to relinquish that opinion, and have therefore endeavoured to seek after some better reason. In order to it, a friend of mine, who is an excellent anatomist, has promised me by the first opportunity to dissect a woman's Tongue, and to examine whether there may not be in it certain juices which render it so wonderfully voluble or suppliant, or whether the fibres of it may not be made up of a finer or more pliant thread, or whether there are not in it some particular muscles which dart it up and down by such sudden glances and vibrations; or whether in the last place, there may not be some certain undiscovered channels running from the head and the heart, to this little instrument of Loquacity, and conveying into it a perpetual affluence of animal spirits. Nor must I omit the reason which Hudibras has given, why those who can talk on trifles speak with the greatest fluency; namely, that the Tongue is like

like a race-horse, which runs the faster the lesser weight it carries.

Which of these reasons soever may be looked upon as the most probable, I think the Irishman's thought was very natural, who after some hours conversation with a female Orator, told her, that he believed her Tongue was very glad when she was asleep, for that it had not a moment's rest all the while she was awake.

That excellent old ballad of the wanton wife of Bath, has the following remarkable lines.

I think, quoth Thomas, womens Tongues
Of Aspen leaves are made.

And Ovid, though in the description of a very barbarous circumstance, tells us, that when the Tongue of a beautiful Female was cut out, and thrown upon the ground, it could not forbear muttering even in that posture.

————— *Comprensam forcipe linguam Abtulit ense fero. Radix micat ultima linguae.
Ipsa jacet, terraeque tremens immurmurat aëre;
Uique salire solet mutilatae cauda colubæ Palpitat*————— Met. l. 6. v. 556.

————— The blade had cut
Her tongue sheer off, close to the trembling root :
The mangl'd part still quiver'd on the ground,
Murmuring with a faint imperfect sound ;
And, as a Serpent wreaths his wounded train,
Uneasy, panting, and possess'd with pain.

C R O X A L.

If

If a Tongue would be talking without a mouth, what could it have done when it had all its organs of speech, and accomplices of sound about it? I might here mention the story of the Pippin woman, had not I some reason to look upon it as fabulous.

I must confess I am so wonderfully charmed with the music of this little instrument, that I would by no means discourage it. All that I aim at by this dissertation is, to cure it of several disagreeable notes, and in particular of those little jarrings and dissonances which arise from anger, censoriousness, gossiping, and coquetry. In short, I would always have it tuned by good-nature, truth, discretion, and sincerity. C

N^o 248 Friday, December 14.

Hoc maxime officii est, ut quisque maxime opis indigeat, ita ei potissimum opitulari. Tull.

It is a principal point of duty, to assist another most, when he stands most in need of assistance.

THERE are none who deserve superiority over others in the esteem of mankind, who do not make it their endeavour to be beneficial to society; and who upon all occasions which their circumstances of life can administer, do not take a certain unfeigned pleasure in conferring ferring benefits of one kind or other. Those whose great talents and high birth have placed them in conspicuous stations of life, are indispensably obliged to exert some noble inclinations for the service of the world, or else such advantages become misfortunes, and shade and privacy are a more eligible portion. Where opportunities and inclinations are given to the same person, we sometimes see sublime instances of virtue, which so dazzle our imaginations, that we look with scorn on all which in lower scenes of life we may ourselves be able to practise. But this is a vicious way of thinking; and it bears some spice of Romantic madness, for a man to imagine that he must grow ambitious, or seek adventures to be able to do great actions. It is in every man's power in the world who is above mere poverty, not only to do things worthy but heroic. The great foundation of civil virtue is self-denial; and there is no one above the necessities of life, but has opportunities of exercising that noble quality, and doing as much as his circumstances will bear for the ease and convenience of other men; and he who does more than ordinary men practise upon such occasions as occur in his life, deserves the value of his friends as if he had done enterprizes which are usually attended with the highest glory. Men of public spirit differ rather in their circumstances than their virtue; and the man who does all he can in a low station, is more a Hero than he who omits any worthy action he is able to accomplish in a great one. It is not many years ago ago since Lapirius, in wrong of his elder brother, came to a great estate by gift of his father, by reason of the dissolute behaviour of the first-born. Shame and contrition reformed the life of the disinherited youth, and he became as remarkable for his good qualities as formerly for his errors. Lapirius, who observed his brother's amendment, sent him on a new-year's day in the morning the following Letter:

Honoured Brother,

‘ I Inclose to you the deeds whereby my father ‘ gave me this house and land: Had he ‘ lived until now, he would not have bestowed ‘ it in that manner; he took it from the man
 ‘ you were, and I restore it to the man you ‘ are. I am,

Sir,

Your affectionate brother,
 and humble servant,

P. T.

As great and exalted spirits undertake the pursuit of hazardous actions for the good of others, at the same time gratifying their passion for glory; so do worthy minds in the domestic way of life deny themselves many advantages, to satisfy a generous benevolence which they bear to their friends oppressed with distresses and calamities. Such natures one may call stores of Providence, which are actuated by a secret celestial influence to undervalue the ordinary gra-gratifications of wealth, to give comfort to an heart loaded with affliction, to save a falling family, to preserve a branch of trade in their neighbourhood, and give work to the industrious, preserve the portion of the helpless infant, and raise the head of the mourning father. People whose hearts are wholly bent towards pleasure, or intent upon gain, never hear of the noble occurrences among men of industry and humanity. It would look like a city Romance, to tell them of the generous Merchant, who the other day sent this billet to an eminent Trader under difficulties to support himself, in whose fall many hundreds besides himself had perished; but because I think there is more spirit and true gallantry in it than in any Letter I have ever read from Strepson to Phyllis, I shall insert it even in the mercantile honest stile in which it was sent.

S I R,

I Have heard of the casualties which have involved you in extreme distress at this time; and knowing you to be a man of great goodness, industry and probity, have resolved to stand by you. Be of good cheer, the bearer brings with him five thousand pounds, and has my order to answer your drawing as much more on my account. I did this in haste, for fear I should come too late for your relief; but you may value yourself with me to the sum of fifty thousand pounds, for I can very cheerfully run the hazard of being so much ‘ less rich than I am now, to save an honest ‘ man whom I love.

Your friend and servant,

W. P.

I think there is somewhere in Montaigne mention made of a family-book, wherein all the occurrences that happened from one generation of that house to another were recorded. Were there such a method in the families which are concerned in this generosity, it would be an hard task for the greatest in Europe to give, in their own, an instance of a benefit better placed, or conferred with a more graceful air. It has been heretofore urged how barbarous and inhuman is any unjust step made to the disadvantage of a Trader; and by how much such an act towards him is detestable, by so much an act of kindness towards him is laudable. I remember to have heard a Benchers of the Temple tell a story of a tradition in their house, where they had formerly a custom of choosing Kings for such a season, and allowing him his expences at the charge of the society: One of our Kings, said my friend, carried his royal inclination a little too far, and there was a committee ordered to look into the management of his treasury. Among other things it appeared, that his Majesty walking incog. in the cloister, had overheard a poor man say to another, such a small sum would make me the happiest man in the world. The King out of his royal compassion privately inquired inquired into his character, and finding him a proper object of charity, sent him the money. When the committee read the report, the house passed his accounts with a plaudite without farther examination, upon the recital of this article in them,

| | | | | |
|---|------------------------|----|------|------|
| | | l. | s. | d. |
| T | For making a man happy | 10 | : 00 | : 00 |

N^o 249 Saturday, December 15.

Γέλως ἀκαιρὸς ἐν βροτοῖς δεινὸν κακόν. Frag. Vet. Poet.

Mirth out of season is a grievous ill.

WHEN I make choice of a subject that has not been treated on by others, I throw together my reflexions on it without any order or method, so that they may appear rather in the looseness and freedom of an essay, than in the regularity of a set discourse. It is after this manner that I shall consider Laughter and Ridicule in my present Paper.

Man is the merriest species of the creation, all above and below him are serious. He sees things in a different light from other Beings, and finds his mirth arising from objects that perhaps cause something like pity or displeasure in higher natures. Laughter is indeed a very good counterpoise to the spleen; and it seems but reasonable that we should be capable of receiving joy from what is no real good to us, since we can receive grief from what is no real evil.

I have in my forty-seventh Paper raised a Speculation on the notion of a modern Philosopher, who describes the first motive of Laughter to be a secret comparison which we make between ourselves, and the persons we laugh at; or, in other words, that satisfaction which we receive from the opinion of some pre-eminence in ourselves, when we see the absurdities of another, or when we reflect on any past absurdities of our own. This seems to hold in most cases, and we may observe that the vainest part of mankind are the most addicted to this passion.

I have read a sermon of a Conventual in the church of Rome, on those words of the wise man, 'I said of laughter, it is mad; and of mirth, 'what does it?' Upon which he laid it down as a point of doctrine, that Laughter was the effect of original sin, and that Adam could not laugh before the fall.

Laughter, while it lasts, slackens and unbraces the mind, weakens the faculties, and causes a kind of remissness and dissolution in all the powers of the Soul: And thus far may it be looked upon as a weakness in the composition of human nature. But if we consider the frequent reliefs we receive from it, and how often it breaks the gloom which is apt to depress the mind and damp our spirits, with transient unexpected gleams of joy, one would take care not to grow too wise for so great a pleasure of life.

The talent of turning men into Ridicule,
and

and exposing to Laughter those one converses with, is the qualification of little ungenerous tempers. A young man with this cast of mind cuts himself off from all manner of improvement. Every one has his flaws and weaknesses; nay, the greatest blemishes are often found in the most shining characters; but what an absurd thing is it to pass over all the valuable parts of a man, and fix our attention on his infirmities? To observe his imperfections more than his virtues? and to make use of him for the sport of others, rather than for our own improvement?

We therefore very often find, that persons the most accomplished in Ridicule are those who are very shrewd at hitting a blot, without exerting any thing masterly in themselves. As there are many eminent Critics who never writ a good line, there are many admirable Buffoons that animadvert upon every single defect in another, without ever discovering the least beauty of their own. By this means, these unlucky little Wits often gain reputation in the esteem of vulgar minds, and raise themselves above persons of much more laudable characters.

If the talent of Ridicule were employed to laugh men out of vice and folly, it might be of some use to the world; but instead of this, we find that it is generally made use of to laugh men out of virtue and good sense, by attacking every thing that is solemn and serious, decent and praise-worthy in human life.

We may observe, that in the first ages of the world, when the great Souls and master-pieces of human nature were produced, men shined by a noble simplicity of behaviour, and were strangers to those little embellishments which are so fashionable in our present conversation. And it is very remarkable, that notwithstanding we fall short at present of the ancients in poetry, painting, oratory, history, architecture, and all the noble arts and sciences which depend more upon genius than experience, we exceed them as much in doggerel, humour, burlesque, and all the trivial arts of Ridicule. We meet with more rally among the moderns, but more good sense among the ancients.

The two great branches of Ridicule in writing are comedy and burlesque. The first ridicules persons by drawing them in their proper characters, the other by drawing them quite unlike themselves. Burlesque is therefore of two kinds; the first represents mean persons in the accoutrements of Heroes, the other describes great persons acting and speaking like the basest among the people. Don Quixote is an instance of the first, and Lucian's Gods of the second. It is a dispute among the Critics, whether burlesque poetry runs best in heroic verse, like that of the Dispensary; or in doggerel, like that of Hudibras. I think where the low character is to be raised, the heroic is the proper measure; but when an Hero is to be pulled down and degraded, it is done best in doggerel.

If Hudibras had been set out with as much wit and humour in heroic verse as he is in doggerel, he would have made a much more agreeable able figure than he does ; though the generality of his readers are so wonderfully pleased with the double rhimes, that I do not expect many will be of my opinion in this particular.

I shall conclude this Essay upon Laughter with observing, that the metaphor of Laughing, applied to fields and meadows when they are in flower, or to trees when they are in blossom, runs through all languages ; which I have not observed of any other metaphor, excepting that of fire and burning when they are applied to Love. This shews that we naturally regard Laughter, as what is in itself both amiable and beautiful. For this reason likewise Venus has gained the title of Φιλομείδης, the Laughter-loving Dame, as Waller has translated it, and is represented by Horace as the Goddess who delights in Laughter. Milton, in a joyous assembly of imaginary persons, has given us a very poetical figure of Laughter. His whole band of mirth is so finely described, that I shall set down the passage at length.

But come thou Goddess fair and free,
In heav'n yclep'd Euphrosynè,
And by men, heart-easing mirth,
Whom lovely Venus at a birth,
With two sister Graces more,
To ivy-crowned Bacchus bore :
Haste thee Nymph, and bring with thee
Jest and youthful jollity,
Quips and cranks, and wanton wiles,
Nods, and becks, and wreathed smiles,
Such as hang on Hebe's cheek,
And love to live in dimple fleck :

Sport that wrinkled Care derides,
 And Laughter holding both his sides.
 Come, and trip it, as you go,
 On the light fantastic toe:
 And in thy right hand lead with thee
 The mountain Nymph, sweet Liberty;
 And if I give thee honour due,
 Mirth, admit me of thy crew,
 To live with her, and live with thee,
 In unreprieved pleasures free.

C

N^o 250 Monday, December 17.

Disce docendus adhuc, quæ censet amicus, ut si Cæcus iter monstrare velit; tamen aspice si quid Et nos, quod cures proprium fecisse, loquamur.

Hor. Ep. 17. l. 1. v. 3.

Yet hear what thy unskilful friend can say,
 As if one blind pretends to shew the way;
 Yet see a-while, if what is fairly shewn
 Be good, and such as you may make your own.

CREECH.

MR. SPECTATOR,

‘ YOU see the nature of my request by the ‘ Latin motto which I address to you.
 ‘ I am very sensible I ought not to use many ‘ words to you, who are one of but few; but ‘ the following piece, as it relates to Speculation ‘ in propriety of speech, being a curiosity in ‘ its kind, begs your patience. It was found ‘ in

‘ in a poetical Virtuoso’s closet among his rarities; and since the several treatises of thumbs, ears, and noses, have obliged the world, this of Eyes is at your service.

‘ The first Eye of consequence (under the invisible Author of all) is the visible luminary of the Universe. This glorious Spectator is said never to open his Eyes at his rising in a morning, without having a whole kingdom of adorers in Persian silk waiting at his Levée. Millions of creatures derive their sight from this Original, who, besides his being the great Director of Optics, is the surest test whether Eyes be of the same species with that of an eagle, or that of an owl: The one he emboldens with a manly assurance to look, speak, act or plead before the faces of a numerous assembly; the other he dazzles out of countenance into a sheepish dejectedness. The Sun-proof Eye dares lead up a dance in a full court; and without blinking at the lustre of Beauty, can distribute an Eye of proper complaisance to a room crowded with company, each of which deserves particular regard; while the other sneaks from conversation, like a fearful debtor, who never dares to look out, but when he can see no body, and no body him.

‘ The next instance of Optics is the famous Argus, (who to speak the language of Cambridge) was one of an hundred; and being used as a spy in the affairs of jealousy, was obliged to have all his Eyes about him. We have no account of the particular colours,

‘ casts and turns of this body of Eyes; but as ‘ he was pimp for his mistress Juno, it is pro‘ bable he used all the modern leers, sly glances,
‘ and other ocular activities to serve his purpose.
‘ Some look upon him as the then King at ‘ arms to the heathenish Deities; and make no ‘ more of his Eyes than so many spangles of his ‘ Herald’s coat.

‘ The next upon the Optic list is old Janus, ‘ who stood in a double-sighted capacity, like a ‘ person placed betwixt two opposite looking-‘ glasses, and so took a sort of retrospective cast ‘ at one view. Copies of this double-faced way ‘ are not yet out of fashion with many professions,
‘ and the ingenious Artists pretend to keep up ‘ this species by double-headed canes and spoons; ‘ but there is no mark of this faculty, except in ‘ the emblematical way of a wise general hav‘ ing an Eye to both front and rear, or a pious ‘ man taking a review and prospect of his past
‘ and future State at the same time.

‘ I must own, that the names, colours, qua‘ lities, and turns of Eyes vary almost in every ‘ head; for, not to mention the common appella‘ tions of the black, the blue, the white, the gray, ‘ and the like; the most remarkable are those that ‘ borrow their titles from animals, by virtue of ‘ some particular quality of resemblance they ‘ bear to the Eyes of the respective creatures; ‘ as that of a greedy rapacious aspect takes its ‘ name from the cat, that of a sharp piercing ‘ nature from the hawk, those of an amo‘ rous roguish look derive their title even from
‘ the

‘ the sheep; and we say such an one has a ‘ sheep’s Eye, not so much to denote the inno‘ cence as the simple slyness of the cast: Nor ‘ is this metaphorical inoculation a modern ‘ invention, for we find Homer taking the free‘ dom to place the Eye of an ox, bull, or cow
 ‘ in one of his principal Goddeesses, by that fre‘ quent expression of Βούπις πότνια Ἥρη—————

The Ox-ey’d venerable Juno.

‘ Now as to the peculiar qualities of the Eye, ‘ that fine part of our constitution seems as much ‘ the reception and seat of our passions, appetites ‘ and inclinations as the mind itself; and at least ‘ it is the outward portal to introduce them to ‘ the house within, or rather the common ‘ thorough-fare to let our affections pass in and ‘ out. Love, anger, pride, and avarice, all ‘ visibly move in those little Orbs. I know a ‘ young Lady that cannot see a certain Gentle‘ man pass by without shewing a secret desire of ‘ seeing him again by a dance in her Eye-balls; ‘ nay, she cannot for the heart of her help look‘ ing half a street’s length after any man in a ‘ gay dress. You cannot behold a covetous spirit ‘ walk by a gold-smith’s shop without casting a ‘ wishful Eye at the heaps upon the counter.
 ‘ Does not a haughty person shew the temper of ‘ his Soul in the supercilious roll of his Eye? and ‘ how frequently in the height of passion does that ‘ moving Picture in our head start and stare, ‘ gather a redness and quick flashes of light‘ ning, ning, and makes all its humours sparkle with fire, as Virgil finely describes it.

— Ardentis ab ore

Scintille absistunt : oculis micat acribus ignis.

Æn. 12. v. 101.

— From his wide nostrils flies

A fiery steam, and sparkles from his Eyes.

DRYDEN.

‘ As for the various turns of the Eye-sight, ‘ such as the voluntary or involuntary, the half ‘ or the whole leer, I shall not enter into a very ‘ particular account of them; but let me observe, ‘ that oblique vision, when natural, was anciently
‘ the mark of bewitchery and magical fascina‘ tion, and to this day it is a malignant ill look;
‘ but when it is forced and affected it carries a ‘ wanton design, and in Play-houses, and other ‘ public places, this ocular intimation is often an ‘ assignation for bad practices: But this irregu‘ larity in vision, together with such enormities as ‘ tipping the wink, the circumspensive roll, the ‘ side-peep through a thin hood or fan, must ‘ be put in the class of Heteroptics, as all wrong ‘ notions of religion are ranked under the gene‘ ral name of Heterodox. All the pernicious ‘ applications of sight are more immediately ‘ under the direction of a SPECTATOR; and ‘ I hope you will arm your readers against ‘ the mischiefs which are daily done by killing ‘ Eyes, in which you will highly oblige your ‘ wounded unknown friend,

T. B.

Mr.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

‘ YOU professed in several Papers your particular endeavours in the province of SPECTATOR, to correct the offences committed by Starers, who disturb whole assemblies without any regard to time, place or modesty. You complained also, that a Starer is not usually a person to be convinced by the reason of the thing, nor so easily rebuked, as to amend by admonitions. I thought therefore fit to acquaint you with a convenient mechanical way, which may easily prevent or correct Staring, by an optical contrivance of new perspective-glasses, short and commodious like Opera glasses, fit for short-sighted people as well as others, these glasses making the objects appear, either as they are seen by the naked Eye, or more distinct, though somewhat less than life, or bigger and nearer. A person may, by the help of this invention, take a view of another, without the impertinence of Staring; at the same time it shall not be possible to know whom or what he is looking at. One may look towards his right or left hand, when he is supposed to look forwards: This is set forth at large in the printed proposals for the sale of these glasses, to be had at Mr. Dillon's in Long-Acre, next door to the White-Heart. Now, Sir, as your Spectator has occasioned the publishing of this invention for the benefit of modest Spectators, the Inventor desires your admonitions concerning the decent use of it; and

‘ and hopes, by your recommendation, that for ‘ the future beauty may be beheld without the ‘ torture and confusion which it suffers from the ‘ insolence of starers. By this means you will ‘ relieve the innocent from an insult which there ‘ is no law to punish, though it is a greater ‘ offence than many which are within the cog‘ nizance of justice.

I am, Sir,

Your most humble servant,

Q

Abraham Spy.

N^o 251 Tuesday, December 18.

—Linguae centum sunt, oraque centum,
Ferrea Vox——— Virg. Æn. 6. v. 625.

—A hundred mouths, a hundred tongues,
 And throats of brass inspir'd with iron lungs,
 DRYDEN.

THERE is nothing which more astonishes a Foreigner, and frights a country 'Squire, than the Cries of London. My good friend Sir ROGER often declares, that he cannot get them out of his head or go to sleep for them, the first week that he is in town. On the contrary, WILL HONEYCOMB calls them the Ramage de la Ville, and prefers them to the sounds of larks and nightingales, with all the music of the ‘ fields fields and woods. I have lately received a Letter from some very odd fellow upon this subject, which I shall leave with my reader, without saying any thing further of it.

S I R,

I Am a man out of business, and would willingly turn my head to any thing for an honest livelihood. I have invented several projects for raising many millions of money without burdening the subject, but I cannot get the parliament to listen to me, who look upon me, forsooth, as a crack, and a projector; so that despairing to enrich either myself or my country by this public-spiritedness, I would make some proposals to you relating to a design which I have very much at heart, and which may procure me a handsom subsistence, if you will be pleased to recommend it to the cities of London and Westminster.

The post I would aim at, is to be Comptroller-general of the London Cries, which are at present under no manner of rules or discipline. I think I am pretty well qualified for this place, as being a man of very strong lungs, of great insight into all the branches of our British trades and manufactures, and of a competent skill in music.

The Cries of London may be divided into vocal and instrumental. As for the latter they are at present under a very great disorder. A freeman of London has the privilege of disturbing a whole street for an hour together, with

‘ with the twanking of a brass-kettle or a frying-‘ pan. The Watchman’s thump at midnight ‘ startles us in our beds, as much as the breaking-‘ in of a thief. The Sowgelder’s horn has in‘ deed something musical in it, but this is seldom ‘ heard within the liberties. I would therefore ‘ propose, that no instrument of this nature should ‘ be made use of, which I have not tuned
‘ and licensed, after having carefully examined ‘ in what manner it may affect the ears of her ‘ Majesty’s liege subjects.

‘ Vocal Cries are of a much larger extent,
‘ and indeed so full of incongruities and bar‘ barisms, that we appear a distracted city to ‘ foreigners, who do not comprehend the mean‘ ing of such enormous outcries. Milk is gene‘ rally sold in a note above E la, and in sounds ‘ so exceeding shrill, that it often sets our teeth ‘ on edge. The Chimney-sweeper is confined ‘ to no certain pitch; he sometimes utters him‘ self in the deepest base, and sometimes in the ‘ sharpest treble; sometimes in the highest, and ‘ sometimes in the lowest note of the gamut.
‘ The same observation might be made on the ‘ retailers of small-coal, not to mention broken ‘ glasses or brick-dust. In these therefore, and ‘ the like cases, it should be my care to sweeten
‘ and mellow the voices of these itinerant Trades‘ men, before they make their appearance in ‘ our streets, as also to accommodate their Cries ‘ to their respective wares; and to take care in ‘ particular, that those may not make the most ‘ noise who have the least to sell, which is very ‘ observ-

‘ observable in the venders of card-matches, to ‘ whom I cannot but apply that old proverb of ‘ “ Much cry but little wool.”

‘ Some of these last-mentioned musicians are ‘ so very loud in the sale of these trifling manu‘ factures, that an honest splenetic Gentleman ‘ of my acquaintance bargained with one of ‘ them never to come into the street where he ‘ lived: But what was the effect of this con‘ tract? Why, the whole tribe of card-match-‘ makers which frequent that quarter, passed by ‘ his door the very next day, in hopes of being ‘ bought off after the same manner.

‘ It is another great imperfection in our Lon- ‘ don Cries, that there is no just time nor measure ‘ observed in them. Our News should indeed ‘ be published in a very quick time, because it ‘ is a commodity that will not keep cold. It ‘ should not, however, be cried with the same ‘ precipitation as fire: Yet this is generally
‘ the case: A bloody battle alarms the town ‘ from one end to another in an instant. Every ‘ motion of the French is published in so great ‘ a hurry, that one would think the enemy were ‘ at our gates. This likewise I would take ‘ upon me to regulate in such a manner, that ‘ there should be some distinction made between ‘ the spreading of a victory, a march, or an ‘ incampment, a Dutch, a Portugal, or a Spanish ‘ mail. Nor must I omit under this head those ‘ excessive alarms with which several boisterous ‘ rustics infest our streets in turnip season; and ‘ which are more inexcusable, because these are ‘ wares

‘ wares which are in no danger of cooling upon ‘ their hands.

‘ There are others who affect a very flow ‘ time, and are, in my opinion, much more ‘ tunable than the former; the Cooper in par‘ ticular swells his last note in an hollow voice, ‘ that is not without its harmony; nor can I ‘ forbear being inspired with a most agreeable ‘ melancholy, when I hear that sad and solemn ‘ air with which the public are very often asked, ‘ if they have any chairs to mend? Your own ‘ memory may suggest to you many other la‘ mentable ditties of the same nature, in which ‘ the music is wonderfully languishing and me‘ lodious.

‘ I am always pleased with that particular ‘ time of the year which is proper for the ‘ pickling of dill and cucumbers; but alas, this ‘ Cry, like the song of the nightingale, is not ‘ heard above two months. It would therefore ‘ be worth while to consider, whether the same ‘ air might not in some cases be adapted to other ‘ words.

‘ It might likewise deserve our most serious ‘ consideration, how far, in a well-regulated ‘ city, those humourists are to be tolerated,
‘ who, not contented with the traditional Cries ‘ of their fore-fathers, have invented particular ‘ songs and tunes of their own: Such as was,
‘ not many years since, the Pastry-man, com‘ monly known by the name of the Colly-Molly-‘ Puff; and such as is at this day the vender
‘ of powder and wash-balls, who, if I am ‘ rightly

‘ rightly informed, goes under the name of ‘ Powder-Watt.

‘ I must not here omit one particular absurdity which runs through this whole vociferous generation, and which renders their Cries very often not only incommodious, but altogether useless to the public; I mean, that idle accomplishment which they all of them aim at, of crying so as not to be understood. Whether or no they have learned this from several of our affected singers, I will not take upon me to say; but most certain it is, that people know the wares they deal in rather by their tunes than by their words; insomuch that I have sometimes seen a country boy run out to buy apples of a bellows-mender, and ginger-bread from a grinder of knives and scissars. Nay so strangely infatuated are some very eminent artists of this particular grace in a Cry, that none but their acquaintance are able to guess at their profession; for who else can know, that “Work if I had it,” should be the signification of a Corn-cutter?

‘ Forasmuch therefore as persons of this rank are seldom men of genius or capacity, I think it would be very proper, that some man of good sense and sound judgment should preside over these public Cries, who should permit none to lift up their voices in our streets, that have not tunable throats, and are not only able to overcome the noise of the crowd, and the rattling of coaches, but also to vend their respective merchandises in apt phrases,
‘ and

‘ and in the most distinct and agreeable sounds.
‘ I do therefore humbly recommend myself as a ‘ person rightly qualified for this post; and if ‘ I meet with fitting encouragement, shall com‘ municate some other projects which I have by ‘ me, that may no less conduce to the emolu‘ ment of the public.

I am,

Sir, &c.

Ralph Crochet.

The End of the THIRD VOLUME.

363